An Apostle to China's Millions.

The Late Dr. John Van Nest Talmage's Life of Service and Sacrifice for the Evangelization of Southern China—The Fruits of Forty Years' Labor in Amoy.

FEW biographers have had a more difficult task in producing a complete and satisfactory memoir of a distinguished man, than had Rev. John G. Fagg in writing the book now issued,* describing the life and work of Dr. John Van Nest Talmage, the veteran missionary of Amoy, China. When Dr. Talmage died in the summer of 1892, a sketch of his life, compiled from accounts furntshed by members of his family, was published in this journal, but, as was then stated, the materials for an exhaustive biography were not accessible. The Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church in America had, however, by formal resolution, called for a memoir of its eminent missionary and its publication was awaited with deep interest. Dr. Talmage had labored for over forty years in Southern China, and during that time the number of native Christians had increased from three persons to a great body of over two thousand communicants and six thousand adherents, with twenty organized, self-supporting churches, nineteen native pastors, a school for the training of Bible women, a Theological Seminary, schools for boys and girls, an Orphan Asylum and a hospital under the charge of a native Christian lady, who had received her medical diploma in this country. In a general way it was believed that this success was largely due, under the blessing of God, to the devotion, wisdom and untiring labors of Dr. Talmage, but of the actual facts no one in this country could speak. He was so modest a man, that even to his own family he would not talk of his labors and triumphs and when, toward the close of his life, he complied with a request to write the history of the Amoy Mission, it was found that throughout the volume he had not even mentioned his own name. Only from the testimonies of his surviving colleagues in China and from his letters to friends and relatives, could the story be compiled. Even his diary, which might have been of inestimable service, was written in shorthand, evidently for his own use and not for that of a biographer.

It was on August 19, 1847, the day after his twenty-eighth birthday, that John Van Nest Talmage first set foot in the city that was to be the scene of his forty years' labor. That he was full of joyous enthusiasm is evident from the letters he sent home. Two years he had been waiting for this opportunity to work in China, Leaving Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1845, after graduating with honor, he solemnly consecrated his life to missionary work with the hope that he might be assigned to China. Returning to his home in Somerville, N. J., where the news of his college triumph had preceded him, gladdening the hearts of his beloved parents, he realized how painful to them would be the separation involved by the step he was about to take. Calling his sister Catharine aside, he told her of his decision and be sought her help in breaking to his mother the news which could not but cost her a pang. She was a devoted mother and loved him dearly. But she was also a woman of eminent Christian character. There could be no better testimony of the fact than that three of her sons besides John, entered the service of God and the Christian ministry. These were James R. Goyn, and Thomas DeWitt, the editor of this journal. After the first shock, the devoted mother acquiesced in her son's decision, telling him then, what he had not heard before, that in his boyhood she had praved that he might become a missionary. Her consent and that of his father obtained, the young man waited only until his church could arrange for his departure. One other ordeal, however, had to be passed. The lady who had promised to be his wife and accompany him to China was unable to leave her invalid mother and he had either to postpone his going, or go out alone. He chose the latter course, and on April 15, he began his long voyage from Boston, Mass.

There were four missionaries laboring at Amoy when the young man arrived there; Mr. Pohlman of the American Board, Mr. Stronach of the London Missionary Society, and Messsrs Lloyd and Brown, of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Talmage had come under the auspices of the Reformed Dutch Church, then operating in the foreign mission field in connection with the American Board. He received a cordial welcome from all, and harmonious relations were established which were never disturbed. The field was not an encouraging one. With a population of a quarter of a million, there were but three persons besides the missionaries and their families who could be regarded as Christians. There was of course no church but an abundance of temples. The city was abominably dirty, and the streets so narrow that three persons could not walk abreast. They were also so steep that steps had been cut for the convenience of ascent. No wheeled vehicle could be used, a sedan chair, borne by carriers, being the only alternative to walking. The people, too, were heartless and degraded. Mr. Talmage was inexpressibly shocked during the first few days of his residence, by seeing a man lying in the agonies of death on the roadway, without attracting the slightest sign of pity or sympathy from the crowds hurrying past him. Infanticide, too, was awfully prevalent. From inquiries he made, he was convinced that more than one third of all the girls born were put to death at their birth, and this, too, without the slightest compunction. There was no motive that he could ascertain, except that of avoiding the expense of keeping children who, not being boys, could not be expected to contribute to the support of their parents. But on the whole, the people at that time were not hostile to the foreign missionaries.

NEW GROUND.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage, preached last Sunday in the Academy of Music, N. Y. Text: Romans 15: 20: "Lest I should build upon another man's foundation."

AFTER, with the help of others, I had built three churches in the same city, and not feeling called upon to undertake the superhuman toil of building a fourth church, Providence seemed to point to this place as the field in which I could enlarge my work, and I feel a sense of relief amounting to exultation. Whereunto this work will grow I cannot prophesy. It is inviting and promising beyond anything I have ever touched. The churches are the grandest institutions this world ever saw, and their pastors have no superiors this side of heaven: but there is a work which must be done outside the churches, and to that work I join myself, for awhile, "Lest I build on another man's foundation."

The church is a fortress, divinely built. Now a fortress is for defence and for drill, and for storing ammunition, but an army must sometimes be on the march far outside the fortress. In the campaign of conquering this world for Christ the time has come for an advance movement, for a "general engagement," for massing the troops, for an invasion of the enemies' country. Confident that the forts are well-manned by the ablest ministry that ever blest the church, I propose, with others, for awhile, to join the cavalry, and move out and on for service in the open field.

In laying out the plan for his missionary tour, Paul, with more brain than any of his contemporaries, or predecessors, or successors, sought out towns and cities which had not yet been preached to. He goes to Corinth, a city mentioned for splendor and vice, and Jerusalem, where the priesthood and Sanhedrim were ready to leap with both feet upon the Christian religion. He feels he has a special work to do, and he means to do it. What was the result? The grandest life of usefulness that man ever lived. We modern Christian workers are not apt to imitate Paul. We build on other people's foundations. If we erect a church we prefer to have it filled with families all of whom have been pious. Do we gather a Sunday School class, we want good boys and girls, hair combed, faces washed, manners attractive. So a church in this day is apt to be built out of other churches. Some ministers spend all their time in fishing in other people's ponds, and they throw the line into that church pond and jerk out a Methodist, and throw the line into another church pond and bring out a Presbyterian, or there is a religious row in some neighboring church, and the whole school of fish swim off from that pond, and we take them all in with one sweep of the net. What is gained? Absolutely nothing for the general cause of Christ. It is only as in an army, when a regiment is transferred from one division to another, or from the 14th regiment to the 69th regiment. What strengthens the army is new recruits.

The fact is, this is a big world. When in our schoolboy days we learned the diameter and circumference of this planet, we did not learn half. It is the latitude and longitude and diameter and circumference of want and woe and sin that no figures can calculate. This one spiritual continent of wretchedness reaches across all zones, and if I were called to give its geographical boundary, I would say it is bounded on the north and south and east and west by the great heart of God's sympathy and love. Oh, it is a great world. Since six o'clock this morning at least 80,000 have been born, and all these multiplied populations are to be reached of the Gospel. In England, or in Eastern American cities, we are being much crowded, and an acre of ground is of great value, but out West five hundred acres is a small farm, and twenty thousand acres is no unusual possession. There is a vast field here and everywhere unoccupied, plenty of room more, not building on another man's foundation. We need as churches to stop bombarding the old ironclad sinners that have been proof against thirty years of Christian assault, and aim for the salvation of those who have never yet had one warm-hearted and point-blank invitation. There are churches whose buildings might be worth $200,000, who are not averaging five new converts a year, and doing less good than many a log-cabin meeting-house with tallow candle stuck in wooden socket, and a minister who has never seen a college, or known the difference between Greek and Choctaw. We need churches to get into sympathy with the great outside world, and let them know that none are so broken-hearted or hardly bestead that they will not be welcomed. "No!" says some fastidious Christian, "I don't like to be crowded in church. Don't put any one in my pew." My brother, what will you do in heaven? When a great multitude that no man can number assembles they will put fifty in your pew. What are the select few to-day assembled in the Christian churches compared with the mightier millions outside of them? At least three million people in this cluster of sea-board cities, and not more than two hundred thousand in the churches. Many of the churches are like a hospital that should advertise that its patients must have nothing worse than toothache or "run-arounds," but no broken heads, no crushed ankles, no fractured thighs. Give us for treatment moderate sinners, velvet-coated sinners, and sinners with a gloss on. It is as though a man had a farm of 3,000 acres and put all his work on one acre. He may raise never so large ears of corn, never so big heads of wheat, he would remain poor. The Church of God has bestowed its chief care on one acre, and has raised splendid men and women in that small enclosure, but the field is the world. That means North and South America, Europe, Asia and Africa, and all the islands of the sea. It is as though after a great battle there were left 50,000 wounded and dying on the field, and three surgeons gave all their time to three patients under their charge. The Major General comes in and says to the doctors: "Come out here and look at the nearly 50,000 dying for lack of surgical attendance." "No," say the three doctors, standing there and fanning their patients, "we have three important cases here and we are attending them, and when we are not positively busy with their wounds, it takes all our time to keep the flies off." In this awful battle of sin and sorrow, where millions have fallen on millions, do not let us spend all our time in taking care of a few people, and when the command comes: "Go into the world," say practically: "No, I cannot go; I have here a few choice cases, and I am busy keeping off the flies." There are multitudes to-day who have never had any Christian worker look them in the eye, and with earnestness in the accentuation, say: "Come!" or they would long ago have been in the kingdom. My friends, religion is either a sham or a tremendous reality. If it be a sham, let us cease to have anything to do with Christian association. If it be a reality, then great populations are on their way to the bar of God unfitted for the ordeal, and what are we doing?

In order to reach the multitude of outsiders we must drop all technicalities out of our religion. When we talk to people about the hypostatic union and French Encyclopedianism, and Erastianism, and Complutensianism, we are as impolitic and little understood as if a physician should talk to an ordinary patient about the pericardium, and intercostal muscle and scorbutic symptoms. Many of us come out of the theological seminaries so loaded up that we take the first ten years to show our people how much we know, and the next ten years get our people to know as much as we know, and at the end find that neither of us know anything as we ought to know. Here are hundreds of thousands of sinning, struggling, and dying people who need to realize just one thing—that Jesus Christ came to save them, and will save them now. But we go into a profound and elaborate definition of what justification is, and after all the work there are not, outside of the learned professions, five thousand people in the United States who can tell what justification is. I will read you the definition:

"Justification is purely a forensic act, the act of a judge sitting in the forum, in which the Supreme Ruler and Judge, who is accountable to none, and who alone knows the manner in which the ends of his universal government can best be attained, reckons that which was done by the substitute, and not on account of anything done by them, but purely upon account of this gracious method of reckoning, grants them the full remission of their sins."

Now, what is justification? I will tell you what justification is—when a sinner believes, God lets him off. One summer in Connecticut I went to a large factory, and I saw over the door written the words: "No Admittance." I entered and saw over the next door: "No Admittance." Of course I entered. I got inside and found it a pin-factory, and they were making pins, very serviceable, fine and useful pins. So the spirit of exclusiveness has practically written over the outside door of many a church: "No Admittance." And if the stranger enter he finds practically written over the second door: "No Admittance," and if he goes in over all the pew doors seems written: "No Admittance," while the minister stands in the pulpit, hammering out his little niceties of belief, pounding out the technicalities of religion, making pins. In the most practical, common-sense way, and laying aside the non-essentials and the hard definitions of religion, go out on the God-given mission, telling the people what they need and when and how they can get it.

Comparatively little effort as yet has been made to save that large class of persons in our midst called sceptics, and he who goes to work here will not be building upon another man's foundation. There is a great multitude of them. They are afraid of us and our churches, for the reason we do not know how to treat them. One of this class met Christ, and hear with what tenderness, and pathos, and beauty, and success Christ dealt with him: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first commandment, and the second is like to this: namely, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. There is no other commandment greater than this." And the scribe said to him: "Well, Master, thou has said the truth, for there is one God, and to love him with all the heart, and all the understanding, and all the soul, and all the strength is more than whole burnt offerings and sacrifices." And when Jesus saw that he answered discreetly, he said unto him: "Thou are not far from the kingdom of God." So a sceptic was saved in one interview. But few Christian people treat the sceptic in that way. Instead of taking hold of him with the gentle hand of love, we are apt to take him with the iron pincers of ecclesiasticism.

You would not be so rough on that man if you knew by what process he had lost his faith in Christianity. I have known men sceptical from the fact that they grew up in houses where religion was overdone. Sunday was the most awful day of the week. They had religion driven into them with a trip-hammer. They were surfeited with prayer meetings. They were stuffed and choked with catechisms. They were often told they were the worst boys the parents ever knew, because they liked to ride down hill better than to read Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." Whenever father and mother talked of religion they drew down the corners of their mouth and rolled up their eyes. If any one thing will send a boy or girl to ruin sooner than another, that is it. If I had had such a father and mother I fear I should have been an infidel. When I was a boy in Sunday School, at one time we had a teacher who when we were not attentive, struck us over the head with a New Testament, and there is a way of using even the Bible so as to make it offensive.

Others were tripped up of scepticism from being grievously wronged by some man who professed to be a Christian. They had a partner in business who turned out to be a first-class scoundrel though a professed Christian. Many years ago they lost all faith by what happened in an oil company which was formed amid the petroleum excitement. The company owned no land, or if they did, there was no sign of oil produced; but the President of the company was a Presbyterian elder and the Treasurer was an Episcopal vestryman, and one director was a Methodist class leader, and the other directors prominent members of Baptist and Congregational churches. Circulars were gotten out telling what fabulous prospects opened before this company. Innocent men and women who had a little money to invest, and that little their all, said: "I don't know anything about this company, but so many good men are at the head of it that it must be excellent, and taking stock in it must be almost as good as joining the church." So they bought the stock and perhaps received one dividend so as to keep them still, but after a while they found that the company had re-organized, and had a different president, and different treasurer, and different directors. Other engagements, or ill-health had caused the former officers of the company, with many regrets, to resign. And all that the subscribers of that stock had to show for their investment was a beautifully ornamented certificate. Sometimes the man looking over his old papers, comes across that certificate, and it is so suggestive that he vows he wants none of the religion that the presidents, and trustees, and directors of that oil company professed. Of course their rejection of religion on such grounds was unphilosophical and unwise. I am told that many of the United States army desert every year, and there are thousands of court-martials every year. Is that anything against the United States Government that swore them in? And if a soldier of Jesus Christ desert, is that anything against the Christianity which he swore to support and defend? How do you judge of the currency of a country? By a counterfeit bill? Oh, you must have patience with those who have been swindled by religious pretenders. Live in the presence of others a frank, honest, earnest Christian life, that they may be attracted to the same Saviour upon whom your hopes depend.

Remember scepticism always has some reason, good or bad, for existing. Goethe's irreligion started when the news came Cmany of the earthquake at Lisbon, N. 1, 1775. That sixty thousand people sluld have perished in that earthquake in the after rising of the Tagus so sred his sympathies that he threw up h belief in the goodness of God.

Others have gone into scepticism from a nural persistence in asking the reason wy. They have been fearfully stabbed o the interrogation point. There are so my things they cannot get explained. Tey cannot understand the Trinity or hv God can be sovereign and yet man a fr agent. Neither can I. They say: "I d't understand why a good God should hre let sin come into the world." Neither d I. You say: "Why was that child sted in life with such disadvantages, vile other have all physical and mental e ipment?" I cannot tell. They go out o church on Easter morning and say: "hat doctrine of the resurrection confound-eme." So it is to me a mystery beyond vavelment. I understand all the proces-s by which men get into the dark. I low them all. I have traveled with burn-k feet that blistered way. The first word vich most children learn to utter is, "apa," or, "Mamma," but I think the ft word I ever uttered was, "Why?" I low what it is to have a hundred mid-ghts pour their darkness into one hour. Sch men are not to be scoffed, but helped. 'rn your back upon a drowning man sen you have the rope with which to pull in ashore, and let that woman in the ird story of a house perish in the flames hen you have a ladder with which to help out and help her down, rather than n your back scoffingly on a sceptic hose soul is in more peril that the bodies those other endangered ones possibly n be. Oh, scepticism is a dark land. ere are men in this house who would e a thousand worlds, if they possessed m, to get back to the placid faith of their hers and mothers, and it is our place to p them, and we may help them, never ough their heads, but always through ir hearts. These sceptics, when brought Jesus, will be mightily effective, far more than those who never examined the evi-nces of Christianity. Thomas Chalmers as once a sceptic, Robert Hall a sceptic, obert Newton a sceptic, Christmas Evans sceptic. But when once with strong nd they took hold of the chariot of the ospel, they rolled it on with what mo-entum! If I address such men and wo-en to-day, I throw out no scoff. I implead em by the memory of the good old days, hen at their mother's knee they said: Now I lay me down to sleep," and by ose days and nights of scarlet fever in hich she watched you, and with voice iat you will never hear again, unless you in her in the better country, told you to ever mind, for you would feel better by-nd-by, and by that dying couch where he looked so pale and talked so slowly, atching her breath between the words, and ou felt an awful loneliness coming over our soul; by all that I beg you to come ack and take the same religion. It was ood enough for her. It is good enough or you. Nay, I have a better plea than iat. I plead by all the wounds, and tears, nd blood, and groans, and agonies, and eath-throes of the Son of God, who ap-roaches you this moment with torn brow nd lacerated hand, and whipped back, and aying: "Come unto me, all ye who are veary and heavy laden, and I will give ou rest."

Again, there is a field of usefulness but ttle touched occupied by those who are stray in their habits. All northern nations, ike those of North America, and England, nd Scotland, that is, in the colder climates, re devastated by alchoholism. They take he fire to keep up the warmth. In southern countries, like Arabia and Spain, the blood s so warm they are not tempted to fiery iquids. The great Roman armies never drank anything stronger than water tinged vith vinegar, but under our northern cli-mate the temptation to heating stimulants is most mighty, and millions succumb. When a man's habits go wrong the church drops him, the social circle drops him, good influence drops him, we all drop him. Of all the men who get off track, but few ever get on again. Near my summer residence there is a life-saving station on the beach. There are all the ropes and rockets, the boats, the machinery for getting people off shipwrecks. One summer I saw there fifteen or twenty men who were breakfasting, after having just escaped with their lives and nothing more. Up and down our coasts are built these useful structures, and the mariners know it, and they feel that if they are driven into the breakers, there will be apt from shore to come a rescue. The churches of God ought to be so many life-saving stations, not so much to help those who are in smooth waters, but those who have been shipwrecked. Come, let us run out the life-boats! And who will man them?

Furthermore, the destitute children of the streets offer a field of work comparatively unoccupied. The uncared-for children are in the majority in most of our cities. Their condition was well illustrated by what a boy in this city said when he was found under a cart gnawing a bone, and some one said to him, "Where do you live?" and he answered, "Don't live nowhere, sir!" Seventy thousand of the children of New York City can neither read nor write. When they grow up, if unreformed, they will outvote your children and they will govern your children. The whisky ring will hatch out other whisky rings, and grog shops will kill with their horrid stench public sobriety, unless the Church of God rises up with outstretched arms and enfolds this dying population in her bosom. Public schools cannot do it. Art galleries cannot do it. Blackwell's Island cannot do it. Almshouses cannot do it. New York Tombs cannot do it. Sing Sing cannot do it. People of God, wake up to your magnificent mission! You can do it. Get somewhere, somehow, to work.

I have heard of what was called the "thundering legion." It was in 179, a part of the Roman army to which some Christians belonged, and their prayers, it was said, were answered by thunder and lightning and hail and tempest, which overthrew an invading army and saved the empire. And I would to God that you could be so mighty in prayer and work that you would become a thundering legion, before which the forces of sin might be routed, and the gates of hell made to tremble. All aboard now on the Gospel ship! If you cannot be a captain or a first mate, be a stoker, or a deck-hand, or ready at command to climb the ratlines. Heave away now, lads! Shake out the reefs in the foretopsail! Come, O heavenly wind, and fill the canvas! Jesus aboard will assure our safety. Jesus on the sea will beckon us forward. Jesus on the shining shore will welcome us into harbor. "And so it came to pass that they all escaped safe to land."

They would listen to their teaching, and apparently had little confidence in their idols, although they were very sincere and very much in earnest in worshipping the spirits of their ancestors. The fact that they would listen to the missionaries was, however, encouraging and as Mr. Talmage said in one of his first letters, there was the far better encouragement of God's promise to bless the preaching of his Word.

Mr. Talmage was eager to begin preaching, but he had to gain a masterv of the language, which he declared, was the most difficult language on earth for a foreigner to learn. The study was complicated by the fact that very few of the natives could read the Chinese characters. Later on, that disadvantage was turned to good account by teaching them the Roman letters, instead of their own grotesque signs. Mr. Talmage found that seventeen letters with a few arbitrary signs would represent every sound in the language, and after consultation with other missionaries a system was devised of using Roman letters, which simplified educational efforts for both missionaries and natives. This system Mr. Talmage labored to perfect and in the later years of his life amplified and elaborated in the great literary work which will ever remain a monument to his name. He brought the manuscript of this dictionary with him to America, after his work in China had closed forever and in the preparation of it for the press, he derived the greatest consolation he had for his enforced absence from the scene of his labors. About six months before his death, when he was nearly seventy-three years old, he had the gratification of revising the proof of the last page and of knowing that by this work he would remove the worst of the many difficulties of the missionaries who would come after him.

FARMING OPERATIONS IN SOUTHERN CHINA—PLOWING WITH AN OX.

(From a Photograph in the Possession of Rev. G. E. Talmage.)

A sad event necessitated Mr. Talmage's return to America early in the year 1849. His most intimate friend and colleague, Mr. Pohlman, who had been six years in Amoy was accidentally drowned just as he was beginning to see the fruit of his arduous labors. His sister who had been his constant companion and devoted helper was so prostrated by the shock of his sudden death, that it was necessary to send her home immediately, and as she was too ill to travel alone, it was decided that Mr. Talmage should accompany her. While he was here he made an extensive tour among the churches, pleading the cause of missions. In three months he was ready to return. and he had the pleasure of taking back with him the wife who was to be his faithful and indefatigable helpmeet for many years. Her mother, whose sickness had demanded her first consideration when Mr. Talmage first set out, was now dead, and she was thus set free to fulfil her promise to him and share his hardships and labors. They sailed in March, 1850, arriving in Amoy in the following July. By this time he had acquired a sufficient familiarity with the language to assume sole charge of a station, and an old house wtth a store on the first floor was secured on an elevated site overlooking the harbor. It was remodelled to adapt it for a preaching place, and here he taught, and worked, and preached for nearly twenty years.

During the following year Mr. Talmage announced that a church had been organized with thirteen converts. The London Missionary Society had also eight converts, and he was very much encouraged. His new place had been fitted up by no little labor. One incident, to which he humorously alluded, sheds light on the privations of a missionary life. He could not open his preaching room at nights because he had no lamps. His ingenuity supplied a remedy. He procured some wire, from which he hung some ordinary tumblers from the ceiling. These were filled with oil, and by means of another wire, a wick was suspended in each. The arrangement was not ornamental and the light was not very good, but there was enough for the purpose, and after that there was a meeting every night. The number of inquirers grew. Mr. Talmage was accessible at all hours, and people came to ask questions and learn more about the new doctrines. He dwells pathetically in his letters on the obstacles some of these inquirers had to face in accepting Christianity. One of them gained his livelihood by carving idols, and was able to support his aged mother. If he became a Christian he did not know how he could live. A second would lose his employment if he refused to work on Sunday. A third held a situation under government, which he would have to resign if he became a Christian. A fourth had been severely punished by his father for attending the preaching, and had been threatened with further penalties. But in spite of difficulties and opposition, the numbers grew, and the converts were consistent.

One of the most serious interruptions to the progress of the work, involving no little personal danger, proceeded from the outbreak of a rebellion against the government in 1853. The people of Amoy and its neighborhood sympathized with the insurgents, and the whole district was in the control of the revolutionary party. The imperial troops made several attempts to subdue the city, but were driven back after severe fighting. Mr. Talmage mentions in his letters that several times their six pound cannon balls had penetrated the mission house, and that the inmates had narrowly escaped being killed. On one Sunday there was a fierce conflict waged in the streets around the mission. He held his service as usual, but behind doors locked and barred. The tumult outside, the cries of the wounded, and the hoarse shouts of command were finally too much for his nerves, and he ceased preaching and turned the service into a prayer-meeting. During the progress of the rebellion more than one of his converts was lost to him. The imperial troops seized them in the streets as they were going to or from services and summarily beheaded them, without a trial, or an opportunity for an explanation. Little progress could be made during this time of trouble, but at the close of the struggle there was a great outpouring of blessing. In six months twenty-eight new converts were added to the church, and there was a large number of inquirers. The work spread, too, outside of Amoy, some of the converts being good speakers, who went to outlying places, and preached the Gospel.

From that time forward the history of the Amoy mission is a record of uninterrupted growth and development. Dr. Talmage labored with ever increasing grounds for encouragement. The native pastors increased in number and efficiency, and one of them adds to this memorial volume, in quaint language, his testimony to the value of the training they received from the beloved teacher. It was not until 1880 that Dr. Talmage's vigorous constitution collapsed under the arduous labors of his long service. He was seventy years of age, and forty of those years had been spent in an uncongenial climate under trying circumstances. He was utterly incapacitated for further effort, but he believed that a brief respite at home would enable him to resume his work. He came back to his native land, and the tender care of his sons did all that was possible to reinvigorate his exhausted frame. To within a few weeks of his death he talked of things he would do when he went back to China; but all about him knew that there was no hope of his return. Two years after his arrival in America he peacefully breathed his last. He left three sons, two of whom are ministers in this country. His widow and his two daughters are still engaged in missionary work at the scene of his labors in Amoy.

ZACCHEUS THE PUBLICAN.

S. S. Lesson for March 17. Luke 19: 1-10. Golden Text Luke 19:10. By Mrs. Baxter.

THE Lord Jesus was on his last journey up to Jerusalem. He had sought in vain to prepare his disciples for that which he knew from the Scriptures was coming upon him. "Behold we go up to Jerusalem," he had said to them, "and all the things that are written by the prophets shall be accomplished unto the Son of man. For he shall be delivered up unto the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, and shamefully entreated, and spit upon: and they shall scourge and kill him; and the third day he shall rise again." (Luke 18: 31-33, R.V.) But this supreme work of his mission, which filled his heart, conveyed no meaning to his disciples. Filled with their own preceptions, founded also upon Scripture, they were blind to all which concerned a suffering Messiah, and they were impatient for the promised King who should rule over the house of his father David. "They understood none of these things; and this saying was hid from them, and they perceived not the things that were said."

It was just shortly after this that he met with and healed, blind Bartimeus: the want of understanding in his own disciples did not so occupy Jesus that he ceased to be free for anything to which his Father called him. Whenever a trial, however severe, paralyses us so that we are occupied with it, and have no words or thoughts for anything else, we are not overcomers of, but we are overcome by the trial; we are not yet "more than conquerers through him that loved us." (Rom. 8: 37). Jesus, taking everything from his Father's hand was and purposes, from all which affected him. Having healed Bartimeus, "He entered and passed through Jericho. Now another distraction met him: Zaccheus the publican, a well-known citizen of Jericho, "sought to see Jesus who he was, and could not for the crowd, because he was little of stature." (R. V.) It was apparently such an ordinary thing: the curiosity of a man to see with his own eyes the Prophet who was reputed to be such a worker of miracles. How many more there may have been in the crowd which so often hung around him, drawn thus by curiosity, perhaps by nothing else. And yet so much came out of this incident. Zaccheus, being so short in stature, ran on before, when Jesus approached, and climbed up into a sycamore tree to see him: for he was to pass that way. What was there in the antecedents of this man, which should attract the attention of the Lord Jesus? "He was a chief publican and he was rich:" neither such a position nor such riches had in themselves any attraction for Jesus. But his Father was drawing this man to him, and Jesus himself said: "No man can come unto me except the Father which sent me draw him, and I will raise him up at the last day." (John 6: 22.) Belonging to a class hated and despised by the Jews, the tax gatherers for the hated Roman rule: a class noted for their corruption, a man who was rich, perhaps because of his extortion — this man would seem to have been one of the last to become a disciple. The rich young man had seemed such a hopeful inquirer, yet he went away undecided. Zaccheus seemed so unpromising, yet he went away saved. Let us not judge as to whether this one or that is a likely subject for the grace of God, but let us be ready to his hand whenever he has a message through us to whomsoever it may be.

Zaccheus understood at heart the will of Jesus that he should come down from his post of observation, and make room in his own house for him whom his eyes had sought to see: "And he made haste and came down, and received him joyfully." Do not let us hide from unsaved sinners that conversion is a coming down, and that is also a making room in our lives and homes, our business, our inner and our outer life for Jesus. It is not simply a permission to the Lord Jesus that he may serve our purpose in pardoning our sins, and then minister to us in making us and keeping us happy, as so many seem to think it. It is a coming down from all our own plans of life to surrender them to him; it is a surrender of all our past reputation for goodness, for religiousness, for usefulness, &c., and letting death pass over all we are and have been; it is a coming down from all our own integrity as Job found by his deep humiliation, and as the formerly spotless Saul of Tarsus found when, in his suffering the loss of all things, he placed among them his cherished character as a Jewish saint "as touching the righteousness which is in the law found blameless (Phil. 3: 6, R.V.) Until he saw Jesus, John the Baptist could be the stern, powerful, holy rebuker of kings and teachers and people (Matt. 3: 5-7; 14: 2-4), but having seen him, he must needs say to him, "I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me" (Matt. 3: 14); and again he spoke of him: "He must increase, but I must decrease. John had learned to come down.

O how quickly does the Holy Spirit teach a willing disciple! Zaccheus lost no time in preparing his house for the incoming of the Master. But the enemy of souls does not let his property be so easily snatched from him. He had his devotees, who little dreamed that they were serving his purpose, when "they all murmured, saying: He is gone in to lodge with a man that is a sinner." But this only drew out from Zaccheus that which the Spirit had taught him. Unlike Martha, whose preparation for Jesus was in the multiplication of her housekeeping cares, this publican welcomed him by the announcement of an entire overflowing of the principles which had governed his life. Formerly all had been for Zaccheus; now all should be for the Lord; formerly his will was law; now he determined to live according to the Scriptures. "Behold Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor." This was a good beginning. The man who had calculated in his life hundreds of times more than the rich young man, who had inquired: "What good things shall I do? How much is required of me?" now gives, at one sweep, half his possessions. And, in addition, not as part of this munificent gift, he says: "And if I have done any wrong to any man," I begin now to act according to the Scripture, "I return him four fold" (Ex. 22: 1). Zaccheus threw open not his doors only, but his heart, his life, his purse, his past, and his future to the immediate entrance and lasting rule of Jesus.

This is True Conversion.

Such conversions as these do not need consecration meetings to finish what is begun in a superficial or faulty conversion. In such a conversion a man becomes at once "a new creature, old things have passed away; behold all thing have become new, and all things are of God. (II. Cor. 5: 17, 18.) And Jesus said unto him: "To-day is salvation come to this house, for as much as he also is a son of Abraham." When the pride of the Jews who believed on Jesus was wounded because he had said to them: "If ye abide in my work, then are ye truly my disciples and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free," they answered him. "We be Abraham's seed, and have never yet been in bondage to any man;" and when Jesus explained to them that everyone who sins is a bondservant of sin, and their desire to kill him because he had told them the truth was not consistent with their profession as children of Abraham; He also said: "If ye are Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham." Zaccheus did the works of Abraham. God and his Christ had broken in upon his life, and at any cost to him, he would do the will of God. This was the spirit of Abraham. By faith Abraham, when he was called, obeyed to go out into a place which he was to receive for an inheritance, and he went out, "not knowing whither he went." (Heb. 11: 8, R.V.) It was the same spirit which actuated Zaccheus: his spirit, not his pedigree, stamped him as a true son of Abraham. "They which be of faith, the same are sons of Abraham." (Gal. 3: 7.) The clue to Abraham's life was the estimation in which he held his God: this is equally the case with every true son and daughter of Abraham. Will it cost me too much? Shall I not be a gainer by this? What will so and so think of this? How will it affect my business or my standing with my family or in the world? These are wrong questions.

A SYCAMORE.

THE journey to Jerusalem was nearly done. The caravan had come down the valley beside the Jordan as far as Jericho, where it turned off westward almost at right angles for the metropolis. One short stage of seventeen miles remained to complete the journey. It was probably on April first or second, and Jericho would be in all its glory of spring verdure. The city has vanished, and the miserable village which is now called by its name does not even occupy its site, but one two miles south-east of it. Then it was rich in palm trees, the aroma of which could be detected more than a mile away, and caused it to be known as the perfumed city. The streets were thronged when the caravan arrived with which Jesus traveled. The people wanted to see the brave man who was going to Jerusalem to meet the powerful enemies who had determined to kill him. One man was particularly eager to see the great Teacher and Miracle-worker. This was the wealthy tax-farmer of the district. He was evidently in bad odor in the town. All the men of his profession were, and generally with good reason. The system of collecting the taxes was a vicious one. It was an open speculation. A capitalist or syndicate offered the state a lump sum for the taxes of a district, and undertook the cost of the collection. All that could be got from the people over and above the sum paid was clear profit. They had, therefore, every motive to practise extortion. Duties were levied on native products and on goods carried through the province from outlying districts. The collector appraised the value, and there was no redress when he overestimated it. Besides this, there was corruption and blackmail. An obnoxious person in business might be accused of smuggling, and find it to his interest to settle quietly with his accuser to have the charge withdrawn. So odious were these tax collectors that it was a common saying that where the publican was, there was neither liberty nor justice. Their evidence was not taken in the ecclesiastical courts, and they were notified that even their gifts of alms would not be received at the Temple. They were thus universally detested and despised. Zaccheus appears to have been the superintendent of the district, with men like Matthew, or Levi, the apostle, as his subordinates. He wanted to see Jesus. He knew enough of the temper of the people to be aware that no crowd would make way for him, and being a short man, there would be little chance of his getting a glimpse of him. He therefore climbed into one of the shade trees whose wide-spreading branches extended over the roadway, and from this point of vantage awaited the coming of Jesus and his disciples. The whole town, and Zaccheus as much as any, must have been amazed when Jesus stopped before the tree and singled him out as the man at whose house he wanted to stay. It was a most unpopular thing to do. It is likely, however, that there was not a home in the city where he would have been so joyfully welcomed. The points of the lesson are that the man being really anxious to see Jesus, did not allow ordinary obstacle to prevent him, and that Christ definitely stated the object and purpose of his mission.

Sought to see Jesus. Mr. Moody says tha a man came to him after one of his meet ings and said: "I wish you would tell m why I can't find the Lord." Mr. Mood answered, "Yes, I can tell you. You hav not sought him with all your heart." Th man was too polite to give a direct contra diction, but he said he thought he had. Mr Moody said: "I think you have not; in deed I know you have not, otherwise yo would have found him. Now my friend can tell you the day and hour when yo will be converted." The man looked puz zled as if he thought the Evangelist wa trifling with him. Mr. Moody went on, "Th Scripture says distinctly, ye shall find m when ye seek for me with all your heart.

Because he was little of stature. Some me would under the circumstances have abar doned the effort. Zaccheus, was, however not that kind of man. The difficulty in hi way must be overcome and he climbed int the tree where he would have as good view as the tallest man in the crowd. It i remarkable how often men of great achieve ments have been men of natural disadvant ages. Demosthenes, the greatest orator o antiquity, was a stammerer in his youth so was the modern orator, Curran, whos failure as a speaker earned him the nick name of "Orator Mum," but he becam one of the most eloquent men of his day Milton's blindness did not prevent his be coming a classic author, nor Kitto's dea ness keep him from becoming a great trav eller and writer. In our own time, we hav seen Fawcett, who was totally blind, ris to the first rank as a statesman and phi osopher, and Alexander H. Stephens, th insignificant invalid rise to be the best be loved and most honored citizen of his Stat

I restore him fourfold. A pastry-cook i London was one day surprised by the en trance into his store of a fashionably-dres ed lady who was in a state of distressin agitation. He took h into a back room, and she sat down an gave way to a flood of tears. When sh recovered her composure, she asked him he remembered supplying delicacies to certain school. He said he remembere perfectly. "I was a boarder at the school fi teen years ago," said the lady. "You man used to come with a quantity of tar and cakes every day to sell to the your ladies. When his attention was occupie I often took several things without his se ing me, and I did not pay for them. I a married now with children of my own, b all these fifteen years that sin has been o my conscience. Not long ago I went Christ and asked his forgiveness for all m sins and I believe he has forgiven me. B I want to make restitution to you. The man looked at it and sai "But you could not have taken things this amount?" "Oh, no," said the lad "but I could not be satisfied with bare paying for the things. Take all this, and you do not wish to accept it as paymer use as much as you please in gifts to th poor or in the Lord's service in some way

The Son of man is come to seek and to sa that which was lost. Sir James Simpson r lates the story of a Welsh miner who w in a part of the mine with which he was n familiar. As he was cautiously making l way through the cuttings, a sudden gu of water from a crevice above him exti guished his lamp. He tried to find his wa back but wandered on for hours, as it see ed to him, in the labyrinth of passages. I had no idea of the time and the darkne was like that of Egypt, "a darkness th could be felt." At last utterly exhaust and utterly hopeless, he lay down to d He looked upon himself already as a de man. It was only a question of minut more or less when he would be so in fa His mind was busy with the soler thoughts forced upon him by his conditio when he thought he saw a light glimmeri in the distance. Was it reality or the effe of his disordered imagination? It seem to come nearer and nearer and then as approached close to where the man lay, saw that it was a lamp in the hand of l own brother who had missed him and h spent hours in anxious search for him.

HOPE DAWNING IN THE WEST.

Many Hundreds now Actively Engaged in the Great Work of Relief, and Immediate Danger Past—Nebraska, Colorado, and Kansas in More Hopeful Mood—Relief Work Still Needed In Oklahoma and South Dakota.

AFTER many weeks of united effort, strengthened and consecrated by prayer, the aid rendered by generous Christian people throughout the Union to the stricken West, has begun to produce the desired sults. In at least three of the suffering ates, the relief afforded has not only red thousands from starvation, but has aced the recipients, for the time being, out immediate danger from the twin evils of ld and hunger. In Nebraska, Colorado d Kansas, so liberal has been the aid orded, that the destitution has been narved down to a few isolated localities, and en these will soon be included by the ry thoroughly organized systems of relief that are now in operation in all three ates. In Oklahoma and South Dakota, uch still remains to be done towards helpg the destitute farmers and settlers, to enble them to withstand the rigors of winter d to provide the simple necessaries of life r their families until the next sowing ason; but the same open-handed, practil sympathy that has fed and clothed their others and sisters in misfortune in the eighboring states will doubtless be stirred like efforts in their behalf. Aid is now ing extended to them by THE CHRISAN HERALD Relief Fund, which has me to them in their extremity as a timely d special providence, just as it came to ose in Nebraska, Kansas and Colorado, hom the Fund has been instrumental in ding during the last two months.

A Wide-spread Christian Work.

Since opening our Central Relief Depot, ecember 29, 1894, we have received and rwarded to the West nearly fourteen carads of clothing and provisions, or 1432 arrels, 463 packages, 324 large boxes, 111 rge cases, sixty-one bags or bales, and even trunks clothing. The number of garents of every description for men, women nd children reached nearly 100,000. Among ese were contributions from thirty-nine Christian Endeavor Societies, twenty-two ircles of King's Daughters, twenty-five pworth Leagues, besides the donations of ghty-seven churches and sixty-four Sewng Circles and Missionary Societies. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers in twenty-one tates responded to the call of mercy. To cknowledge all gifts and contributions in etail was an impossibity, yet we are satisfied that no donation, however small, has missed the mark, but all have accomplished omething toward mitigating human suffering.

Any recapitulation of the Relief Fund's work would be incomplete, were the generous service of the American Express Company to pass unrecorded. During the earlier weeks of the Fund, this Company gave its services freely, without charge, for the transportation of clothing and supplies to Nebraska and Kansas, and facilitated the work by every possible means. This splendid co-operation will not soon be forgotten by our readers, nor by those who were aided by the gifts this Company carried to them free. Its generosity has saved a large outlay to the Relief Fund.

Progress in Nebraska.

Under Manager Ludden's thorough system, the work of relief in Nebraska is still progressing rapidly. Under the resolution adopted by the Nebraska Senate, the State Relief Commission reports to the legislature weekly, and Manager Ludden's latest reports shows the shipments of large quantities of groceries, flour, fuel and clothing in a single week to the counties named:

Adams, Antelope, Brown, Boone, Buffalo, Custer, Chase, Dawson, Deuel, Dawes, Dundy, Fillmore, Franklin, Frontier, Furnas, Garfield, Gosper, Greeley, Hall, Harlan, Hayes, Hitchcock, Holt, Howard, Knox, Lincoln, Logan, McPherson, Nance, Phelps, Perkins, Red Willow, Valley, Wheeler and York.

During the same week $3472.07 had been distributed by the Relief Commission in aid of the distressed farmers. It is the aim of the Commission to retain in the hands of the County Central Relief Committee from ten to fourteen days' supplies at all times, and thus to be able to meet any emergency that may arise, and also to continue the relief as long as the necessity for aid exists in any of the afflicted sections. An effort is now being made to raise a special fund of $100,000 to purchase seed grain to be distributed among the impoverished farmers.

In a letter last week to Dr. Klopsch, Manager Ludden makes this statement regarding the Nebraska Relief Commission's resources:

We were receiving abundant supplies, as you know when you were here, but it was just in the closing hours of free billing. The railroads told us that all the supplies we could get on track up to four o'clock on a certain day they would move free for us. We went through all the letters and picked out all the supplies it was possible for us to move, and placed them on track by telegraph. The result was in a few days we had nearly four hundred cars standing on track at Lincoln. These cars—most of them—were loaded promiscuously, I think. Three hundred and six, including coal cars, were of such a nature that we sent them immediately to the drouth stricken district. Many of them were specially assigned that that we had not yet received the disposition of then from the donors, the cars getting here ahead of their letters. Others were of such a nature that it was not good policy to send them forward into any community. To illustrate: one car of sauer kraut, one of salt one of sugar, one of rice, four or five carloads of clothing, thirteen cars of molasses, and a goodly number of cars of flour. We simply broke them up into promiscuous lots, and loaded them with such supplies as would be demanded of us. Now, you will note that we did not have, as the newspapers have published all over the United States, carloads of perishable supplies here. Of course such wild statements of an abundance of perishable supplies simply cut off many splendid donations.

Last week, the Commission began sending out tea and coffee to aged and invalid sufferers, from the Special Fund contributed for that purpose through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A small card accompanies each package.

Brighter Skies in Kansas.

In Kansas the relief movement is producing admirable results, and many thousands of stricken homes have been helped and comforted. The Topeka "Capital," in behalf of its Relief Fund, is meeting hearty responses. This Fund to which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave the initial contribution of $1000 has now reached the sum of $5000, and is growing daily. Its prompt and systematic distribution is effecting much good in the distressed counties. Rev. G. W. Sharpe, our Sunday School missionary, has completed his work of distribution in Kansas.

Among the letters received from that State during the week, we give these extracts, which show the actual condition of the people in some of the needy districts, and the fervent gratitude they feel for the help already extended by the generous readers of this journal. Mrs. E. F. Brown, Liberal, Kan., Superintendent of Public Instruction of Seward county, writes:

I thank God that by some means our needy people are being reached, and that you have discovered that "State pride" has been a hindrance to many receiving help, where it is so much needed. I have been Superintendent of Public Instruction of this county for the past eight years, and know of many in great need, and have made repeated efforts to get help to some of the poor, but the merchants, politicians and "town-boomers," immediately denounce it and any attempt we have made has proved futile. Many are sick and unless they are helped soon I know they must suffer.

Mr. S. S. King, Commander I.O.O.F., and J. M. Mahin, Commander Knights of Pythias, write from Cedarville, Kan.:

There are many families here that have no means of support and absolutely nothing to live on. We have done all we can to avoid having to ask other parts of the world for assistance, but our resources have been well nigh exhausted so that we have to ask for aid for our people. We have organized The Cedarville Fraternal Society which is composed of the members of the different societies of this place consisting of the Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Encampment, Rebekahs, and Maccabees.  It is no uncommon sight to see women and children half clothed and half fed wading the snow with rags tied on their feet to protect them from the snow and frosts. Our pride forbids us asking for assistance, but duty says to do so.

A committee of citizens of Macksville, Kan., writes that there is no destitution in that section of the State and that Stafford county can take care of its own poor.

Colorado Hopeful.

In Colorado, the good work is being pushed energetically by the Denver "Republican," whose Relief Fund (to which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave the first contribution), is now in full and successful operation. The "Republican" writes:

The first car from New York arrived this morning—very opportunely, too, as our supplies were exhausted. During the past week we have been making shipments of food and clothing to about a dozen points in the drouth-stricken region of Colorado. To do that we have had to use only a small portion of our car-load of supplies, having been able to meet nearly all the latest pressing demands. By using your three New York cars judiciously we hope to be able to still longer retain the money we have, for we believe there will be need of every cent of it before the people can reap a harvest. The gathering of these supplies from various sources has occupied almost our entire attention thus far, so that a systematic canvass of the city for money contributions has not yet been made.

Dakota and "The Strip."

The "Republican's" Fund is now nearly $3,000. Before this edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches the hands of our readers the two additional car loads of clothing and supplies forwarded some time ago from our Central Relief Depot in New York, will have reached Denver and been distributed among the destitute by the "Republican's" own corps of distributors.

Appeals for aid still come from Oklahoma and South Dakota. Frederick W. Fay, Lamont, O. T., writes:

We are seeing terrible times this winter. I could name a dozen of our neighbors who are about as destitute as ourselves. I do not know how we are to get seed as we are too poor to buy anything.

Mrs. Jeanette Judd, Little Vale, Okla., the wife of one of the settlers in the Cherokee Strip, sends this earnest appeal:

Our Ladies' Aid Society is trying all within its power to aid some of the sufferers in the Strip. You know when this was opened for settlement, it was all a vast, barren prairie. We passed through the first winds, then almost starved. Last spring we commenced to break out our new homes. We planted but we did not reap, for we lost all our crops, it was so dry and hot. Fever commenced in our land and hardly a family escaped. Another winter is passing and we are all starving. What we live on is not as good as the hogs have in some lands. We have no seed, corn or potatoes to plant or garden seeds, nor seed for our teams. They are living on just the wheat straw they can pick on the bare prairie. If a woman has one dress here, she is doing well. Now many are sick and not clothed enough to keep them warm or food to live on.

These letters are fair specimens of many others from Oklahoma. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already sent some money and clothing to "The Strip," and during the past week it appropriated $500 from the Fund for the purpose of relieving the most urgent cases.

In South Dakota, where a number of our Volunteer Distributors have been at work, the distress is much more general and severe than it is even in the "Cherokee Strip," and the appeals are consequently more numerous. $500 have been sent from the Relief Fund to South Dakota during the week. These and all other sums distributed through the Fund, will be properly accounted for by the Distributors, at the close of their work.

UNCERTAINTY OF LIFE.

I HEAR of trains tumbling into rivers, and of ocean liners sinking through collision, and find so many souls hurled into the next existence, I am reminded how near good people may be to glory without knowing it. The Elbe's passengers started for New York, but arrived in eternity. Some of us are near heaven, not a month away from it, perhaps not an hour. When we part from our friends, reunion is uncertain. When the voyagers left their friends for America they had no idea they were saying goodby forever. My counsel to you is that if you have any duty to perform toward your friends in regard to their eternal interests, you had better perform that duty before they take rail-car or steamer. If there were impenitent persons who perished on that vessel—I say, if there were, how do you suppose their unfaithful Christian friends feel about it now? They are saying: "Oh! if on the day before our friends sailed, we had just asked them to come to Christ and make preparations for eternity; but that was our last chance to win them, our very last chance." Oh, Christian people, wake up to your duty in this respect, and if you have anything for God and for the salvation of your friend, say it now. You remember that when the Ville de Havre was crossing the ocean, the Loch Earn crashed into her, and she sank. A husband and father had sent for his wife and daughter for a pleasure trip in the foreign climes. The daughter perished in the disaster; the life of the wife was saved. On her arrival at Queenstown, she telegraphed to her husband in Chicago, this significant and memorable message: "I am saved alone!" Oh, can it be that any of us in any family circle will be content to seek after God and reach heaven, allowing those who stand around about us to go away unblessed. "Saved alone?"

At such a time, the impenitent people on board had no opportunity for preparation. It is probable that some on board had no religious hope. Yes, probably to some of them that very night Christ had been offered and they rejected him. Not five minutes to think; not three minutes, not two, not one minute. A feeling of sinking and all was over.

Some of you will go out of this life without a moment's warning. You have had friends leave the world. Did they go at the time you expected or at the time they expected? Is it not always a surprise? It has been so with my friends; none of them went away at the time I thought they would. Though their sickness may have lasted for months, yet death was a surprise at the last. So it will be with you in all probability, and so it will be with me. I have not for the last thirty years had any idea of having any time to make preparation for eternity in the closing moments of my life. I am very certain if I do not get prepared for the eternal world in the days of my health, I will never get prepared at all. "In such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh." If to-night you should get a sudden call to the next world, what will be your landing-place? My friends, there is only one common sense thing for us to do, and that is to get our accounts with God fixed up. "This night thy soul may be required of thee."

UNAPPRECIATED AUTHORS.

NONE but those of us who occupy editorial chairs will ever know the ghastliness of the struggle on the part of many of those who are compelled to write for a living. Twenty or a hundred manuscripts rejected where one is accepted. The editor's waste basket, the vortex into which swirl down into oblivion essays supposed to be immortal. Ninety-nine out of every hundred books published not paying for the ink and paper that print them. Oh, the pathos of being compelled to reject unavailable manuscripts written for bread by intelligent wives with drunken husbands and trying to support their families with pen or pencil. Refuse $5 for that article, and the children go supperless to bed. Thousands of persons to-night starving to death with a steel pen in their right hand. The story of Grubb street, London, and poets living on crusts, is being repeated all over this land, although the modern cases are not so conspicuous. Poverty is no more agreeable because classical and set in hexameters. The hungry author cannot breakfast on odes to the moon. Martyrs have perished in the fire, but more persons have perished for lack of fire. On what funeral pyres of epics, sonnets, homilies, tractates, compilations and dissertations authors are all the time burning upon. It is not because this age is harder than its predecessors on literary men and women. In semi-starvation or complete beggary lived and died Tasso and Homer and Dryden and Goldsmith and Fielding and Cervantes and Milton. But it is time that this nineteenth century, which boasts of its intelligence, gave emancipation to the men and women who do its best thinking.

What work I have done has always been appreciated at more than it was worth. But I have for more than twenty years been in position where passed before me perpetually the injustices practiced upon the American literati. And while much has been said about employes' rights, and laborers' rights, and women's rights, not enough has been said about authors' rights. Engaged in a style of work which makes its chief draft upon brain and nerve, they certainly should have as kind consideration as those whose work makes its chief draft upon the muscles.

In olden time a bountiful man brought to a banqueting table all the authors of his day whom he could gather together, and they were arranged at the festal table according to the size of the volumes they had published, from quarto to duodecimo. And so they feasted. But if I had my way I would put at a great banquet of prosperity all the authors and authoresses of this and other lands, and arrange them at the table not according to the size of their books, but according to the injustices they have suffered. Their plate more golden, and with richer viands as their wrongs have been great. And I would make their banquet everlasting. For all who write and print and then depart this life, I would have an epitaph as appropriate as that which I often saw in the old Quaker burying ground of Philadelphia over the body of Benjamin Franklin, a quaint epitaph ordered by himself, and reading thus:

"The body of Benjamin Franklin, printer, like the cover of an old book, its contents torn out, and stripped of its lettering and gilding, lies here food for worms, yet the work itself will not be lost, for it will, as he believed, appear once more in a new and beautiful edition corrected and amended by the Author.'

James B. Thompson, Maitland, Ont. 1. Did God declare his will in the old dispensation by any other extraordinary means than dreams and visions? 2. What were the grievances that induced the ten tribes to revolt? 3. After the division of the kingdom, what special advantages did the ten tribes enjoy?

1. The Bible records actual visits of angels to Abraham, Jacob, Daniel, &c. The narrative in Genesis 19 appears to imply that there was a manifestation of the divine presence in that instance. 2 Only the question of taxation appears on the surface, but there had been jealousy on the part of Ephraim from the beginning of the monarchy. Ephraim was a more powerful tribe than any of the others, and wanted to lead. The Ephraimites were reluctant to accept David as king, because he belonged to the tribe of Judah, and yielded only after seven years of disastrous quarreling. David's removal to Jerusalem of the national capital from Shechem, and the religious capital from Shiloh was another grievance against the house of Jesse. Solomon's magnificence must have involved heavy taxation on the whole country, while the South alone derived benefit or gratification from it. The compulsory attendance at Jerusalem for the annual feasts would also increase the jealousy which culminated when Rehoboam gave his imprudent answer at his coronation. 3. The advantages of numbers and wealth and geographical position. Their lapse into idolatry deprived them of religious advantages.

Herald Reader, Andover, Conn. 1. Is it wrong to ride a bicycle to Church on Sunday? 2. To ride a few miles for the purpose of visiting friends on Sunday? 3. To play cards, billiards and pool if no gambling is done?

1. We have already repeatedly answered similar inquiries. Sunday is dedicated to rest and worship, and to devote any part of it to other purposes is a contravention of the divine command. Works of necessity and mercy are, however, excepted. You must make it a matter of conscience whether bicycle riding to church belongs to this category. We do not believe it can be regarded as a necessity, where the ordinary facilities for attending church exist. 2 Speaking generally, yes; in extraordinary cases, demanding urgency, as sickness, no. Your question conveys the impression that such a ride would be for social recreation alone, which would be Sunday desecration. 3. If you are a Christian or a seeker after religion, you will do wisely to avoid all things that are a hindrance to spiritual progress. No one has ever been helped, spiritually or intellectually by these seductive pleasures and thousands upon thousands have found them stepping-stones to perdition.

A Great Opportunity.

THE publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has decided that none of the valuable books offered to our subscribers as Premiums during the past season will be selected for that purpose next season. Our contracts with the various publishers debar us from thus using them after the close of 1895. In view of this decision, and as we have on hand a limited number of volumes of

"The Pathway of Life,"
"From Manger to Throne," and
"Gospel Hymns, Nos. 1 to 6," we desire to distribute this surplus among our subscribers on the following condition:

For every new Premium subscription at $2 we will send any two premiums of your own selection, to the same or separate addresses, all charges prepaid. One book goes with the subscription as a Premium, and the other book goes to the person sending in the subscription. It should be distinctly understood that the subscription which is sent in under this exceptional proposition must be a NEW one, and it must be stated in the letter accompanying it that such subscription is not intended to take the place of some other subscription about to expire.

To many thousands of our readers, the beauty and value of these three magnificent volumes are already well known. They have, within a brief space of time, secured a world-wide celebrity, and it is because we believe that, next to the Bible itself, they are the books that will be most highly appreciated in every moral, well-conducted, Christian home that we are prompted to make this unusual offer in behalf of those subscribers who wish to secure, both for themselves and their friends, some of these beautiful volumes. "The Pathway of Life," Rev. Dr. Talmage's great work, is a large, finely bound and splendidly illustrated book of 544 pages, replete with the finest and ablest productions of his magic pen. "From Manger to Throne," is a handsome volume of 544 pages, copiously and expensively illustrated and in superior binding; it is, beyond all others, the one simple, eloquent and thrilling story that has ever appeared (outside of the Evangelists' pages), of the Master's earthly sojourn. The "Gospel Hymns Nos. 1 to 6, is a perfect treasury of 725 of the best and sweetest sacred songs for the Church, the Sunday School, and the home, with every hymn in large type set to music, and is adapted to every Christian denomination.

All who have not yet been so fortunate as to secure at least one of these valuable books, should take this opportunity, which will hold good only as long as our supply will hold out.

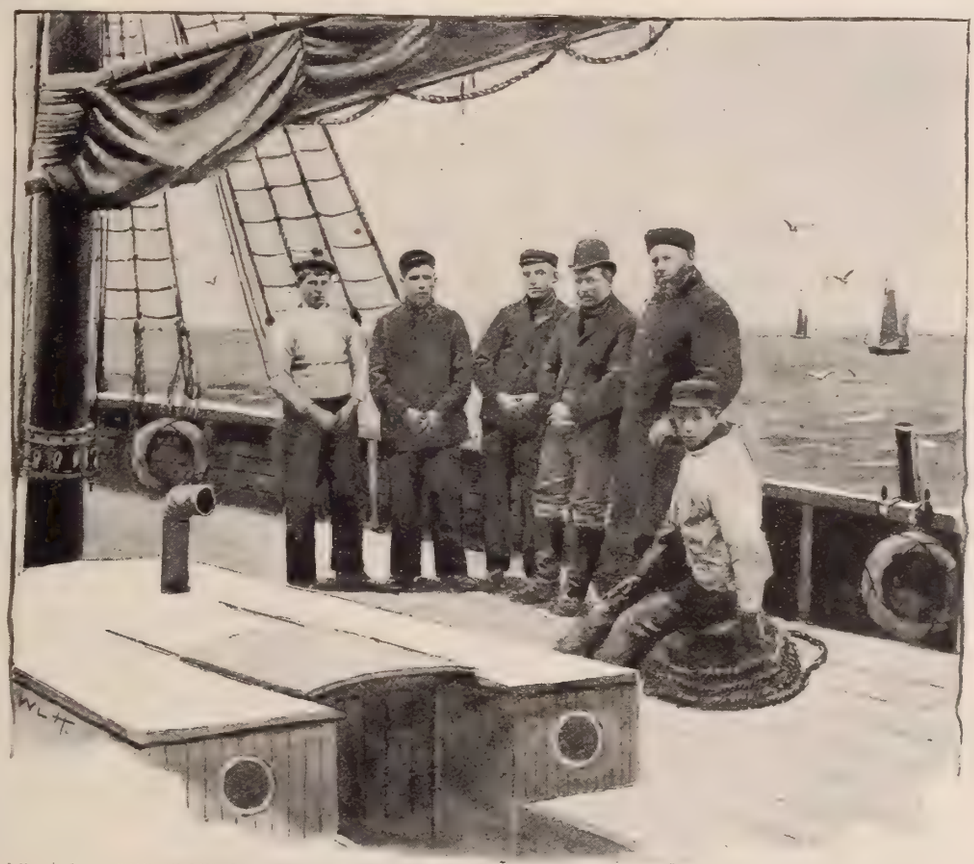
WORSHIPPING THE GANGES.

Bishop Galloway, writing from Benares gives a most interesting description of the idolatrous worship of the Ganges which still prevails there. He says: We were at Benares early, but not in advance of the poor superstitious believers in "Mother Ganges." Taking a rowboat and rowing up the river to the Mosque of Aurungzebe in some respects the most notable building in that city of shrines, we slowly floated down stream, and made observations upon the rarest sight in all the East. Stone steps called ghats, are built down to the water's edge from every house and the foot of every street. Down these steps the people came; men, women and children, old and young, grave and gay. They came in every strange Eastern dress and with all sorts of marks upon their forheads. Some sat under broad palm umbrellas while repeating their prayers, while others stood uncovered, and with uplifted hands, looked into the face of the sun, as they paid to him their adoration

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

RESCUED THE ELBE'S CASTAWAYS.

IMPENETRABLE mystery would probably have hung over the fate of the steamship "Elbe" had it not been for the efforts of the men whose portraits appear on this page. They are the skipper and crew of the fishing boat "Wildflower," on which the handful of survivors from the great steamship were brought to land. The skipper says that about eleven o'clock on the morning of January 30 his smack was trawling off Lowestoft, when he saw a boat drifting about in the distance. It carried no flag or sail, but something was fluttering from its stern. He at once got up his trawling gear to go to the rescue of the boat. As the people in it might think he was not coming to save them, he waved his hat to them to let them know they were seen. When he got close to the boat he saw that the waves were breaking over it, and the men were busily baling out the water. A rope was thrown to them, but they were so cold, wet and numb that it was some time before they could make it fast. The boat was pulled around to the lee side of the smack, and about half of the men jumped on board, but the strain and the heavy sea caused the rope to part, and the boat drifted astern. The skipper put the smack about and followed it. Another was thrown out and secured, and this time all were taken out of the boat, including the woman, who was lying in the water at the bottom of the boat. She was taken below, where she took off her saturated clothes and wrapped herself in hot blankets. There was some beef and cocoa on board, and these were served out, and all was done that could be to make them warm and comfortable till they got to land. When the "Wildflower" rescued them, the boat had been five hours drifting, and the people in it were almost dead with cold. They must have perished if the skipper had not gone promptly to their rescue and treated them so kindly. It was simply an act of common humanity, but how much it meant to the castaways! There are many castaways on life's sea who might be rescued if Christian people who see them would, like the skipper, leave their business for awhile and go to their relief. (James 5: 20.)



THE CREW OF THE "WILDFLOWER" WHICH RESCUED THE ELBE'S CASTAWAYS.

A Purchaser Duped.

A disconcerting discovery was made a few days ago by a Philadelphia firm. About three years ago they had some transactions with a man who professed to be a citizen of Georgia, who was then in the city. He was apparently a man of some standing and the business done with him was perfectly legitimate. He succeeded in gaining the confidence of the firm as his engagements were punctually kept and his accounts duly honored. Shortly before leaving the city he incidentally offered the firm a share of a land speculation. He showed the title deeds to an original grant of seventy thousand acres of unimproved land and offered to sell a thousand acres. After some bargaining the firm bought them at five dollars the acre. No inspection was made and nothing was done about the land, except to pay the taxes upon it every year. A gentleman connected with the firm had business in Georgia recently and he was deputed to look at the land and suggest the best way of utilizing it. On his arrival in Laurens County where it was represented as lying, he could find no such tract of land. He then applied at the Ordinary's office and at other public offices, but was unable to locate the land, although the deeds of purchase were duly recorded. It was clear that the firm had been duped and that the original grant and other deeds, which the vender had shown were forgeries. The firm hope to recover the taxes they have paid, but the purchase money is an absolute loss. Sceptics often try to persuade the Christian that his eternal possession is similarly non-existent; but he need not be alarmed. His title is assured being signed and sealed and confirmed with the oath of God. (Heb. 6: 17.)

The Rescuer Died.

A sad fatality occurred at Greenport, L. I., on February 17. A girl about fifteen years old, employed in the family of one of the citizens was returning from a visit to a farm in the neighborhood. She had with her two daughters of her employer, aged respectively eight and ten years. In crossing the ice on Peconic Bay, the three stepped on an air hole which was partially covered with snow and a thin coating of ice. They all fell in and for a minute it seemed as though all would be drowned. The girl, however, managed to get hold of the solid ice and could have drawn herself out. But she was concerned about the children. She bade them climb over her shoulder on the ice. They clung to her garments and so climbed out safely. They wanted to help her out, but she warned them away, telling them not to come near her, lest they fall in again. She tried to struggle out herself, but had become so benumbed and exhausted that she could not. After one last effort her hands slipped and she fell back and was drowned. It was a noble act of self-sacrifice, but the girl probably hoped to save herself, without risk to the children. It was not so when Christ saved his people. He new that there was no way of saving them but by his death. (John 3: 14.)

No Foreign Flags.

The agitation in New York against the decoration of public buildings with the flags of other nations has at length taken shape in legislative action. Unpleasantness has often been caused by invidious conduct on the part of Mayors, who allowed citizens of one nationality to have their flags on the municipal buildings on their parade days, while refusing the privilege to citizens of other nationalities. A bill has passed the Legislature at Albany and was signed by Governor Morton on February 22, enacting that, "it shall not be lawful to display the flag or emblem of any foreign country upon any State, County or Municipal building." The right is however reserved to the Governor, or Mayor, by special proclamation to permit such display whenever a foreigner becomes the guest of the United States, or of any State or city. The law does not imply that there has been, or is likely to be, any disloyalty, but is intended to check the tendency to perpetuate affiliations which have been renounced. It is much to be wished that the Christian would pass a similar enactment for the law of his life. Many, while bearing the name of Christ and living as his people, are to be found occasionally under the colors of the world, seeking pleasure or profit under its standards. (Gal. 5: 1.)

Failed of Nomination.

Among the reminiscences of a political leader published by a Boston journal, is one of a national convention of the party to which he belonged. He says that the first day's proceedings developed the fact that the balance of power in the nomination of a candidate for the Presidency, would rest with the delegation from a certain State. The responsibility was appreciated and as the delegates were not "instructed," they met in caucus at night with closed doors. In the discussion that ensued, the name of a prominent man was urged and was received with favor. He stood well with the country and there was a strong probability that if he could capture the delegation then in caucus, he would be nominated and elected. Only one of the delegates, a judge of some eminence in the State knew him personally and he not intimately. The judge was asked for his opinion. In reply, he said that he was at college with the prospective candidate and he would relate one incident of college life. He did so and it showed that the young man was in those days destitute of moral principle. The delegates were satisfied that although brilliant, he was a man they could not trust and they unanimously resolved to cast the votes of the State for his rival. The next day the vote was given, as decided, and the man to whom it was given was nominated and elected. Little did the young collegeman think when he committed that escapade, that, a score of years later, it would be the sole cause of his missing the greatest prize on earth—that of being the ruler of fifty millions of people. But sin is always loss and unless it is blotted out by the blood of Christ, it will cause the sinner to lose the greatest prize attainable to a human being in the world beyond the grave—eternal life. (Luke 13: 3.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Jubilee Meetings were Held on February 27 at the Second Presbyterian Church at Richmond, Va., to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the settlement there of the pastor, Rev. Moses D. Hoge, D.D.

The Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church reports total receipts for ten months of $571,960, a gain of $118,987 over the receipts for the corresponding period of last year. Unhappily, the gain is chiefly in legacies, not in receipts from the churches.

Rev. E. P. Hammond Has Been Holding Services at St. Catherine, Ont. Among his most efficient helpers were some who were converted at his meeting held in the same church sixteen years before. The venerable preacher still retains much of his old vivacity and power.

Mrs. Mateer, a Medical Missionary in Wei Hien, China, was present at the meeting of the Woman's Presbyterian Board of Missions of the Northwest, held in Chicago recently. She says that the work is increasing at that station, 17,000 patients having been treated there during the last year.

No Sale of Beer or Spirits is Now Permitted in Christiania, the capital of Norway, from Saturday afternoon till Monday morning, save to permanent guests staying at respectable cafes. This has led to such a diminished consumption that people dependent on the liquor trade are complaining of want of employment.

Mr. D. L. Moody has had very successful meetings at San Antonio and Austin. After visiting other cities in the State he expects to go to Mexico in April.

Evangelist J. H. Cannon with the Wesley Evangelists has been holding services in Bushwick Ave. M. E. Church, Passaic, N. J. There was a large attendance and many persons made profession of faith.

A Revival of a Quiet but Earnest character is reported from Cheshire, Mass. Miss Mary Hitchcock of Brooklyn, N. Y., who was staying in the town began a series of Bible readings in the First Baptist Church, of which Rev. E. N. Harding is pastor. The readings led to a deep interest which has developed into a revival affecting the whole town.

The Washington Government received a dispatch on Feb. 23, from Chefoo, China, stating that the United States steamer "Yorktown" had just arrived there with thirteen missionaries whom it had rescued at Wei-Hai-Wei. Probably it was not a rescue but simply an asylum that the "Yorktown" had afforded the missionaries during the Japanese bombardment.

A District Convention of The Christian Workers' Association will be held March 21-27 in Dr. Russell Conwell's Church in Philadelphia. Prominent Christian Workers in Philadelphia and other cities will take part. All particulars as to board, etc., may be obtained by addressing Rev. John C. Collins, New Haven, Conn.

Mr. D. L. Moody Requests us to announce an opportunity for ministers. It is to spend the month of April in Chicago with the Bible Institute as headquarters, for a special course in the English Bible and a study of the various methods of personal work as applied in the multiform missionary activities of that city. Prof. W. W. White will direct studies in Old Testament Prophecy and the Acts and Epistles each day. Supt. R. A. Torrey will also hold classes and Prof. D. B. Towner will conduct a musical course of instruction. The evenings will be devoted to studying the methods employed in the various missions of the city. The total expense, including room and board, will be five dollars a week. All particulars may be obtained by addressing the Bible Institute, 80 Institute Place, Chicago, Ill.

The Gospel Mission on 146th Street, New York, is making a special effort to reduce the indebtedness on its building. During the past twelve years it has done valuable work in the rescue of drunkards and gamblers. It is now threatened with extinction owing to the sudden foreclosure of the mortgage on its premises. The President of the Mission is Mr. A. M. Smith, 597 East 141st street, New York.

Prof. Sayce Writes Home from Asia Minor that, in searching for new cuneiform inscriptions, he has at last hit on a definite memorial of Nimrod. He identifies him with Nazi Muruda, and finds that he was the contemporary in Babylon of the Assyrian King whose son restored Nineveh about fifty years before the exodus. This curious discovery is regarded here as by far the most valuable confirmation of the Mosaic record yet afforded from this field of investigation.

A Correspondend of the "Interior," Reporting from Princeton, Ind., says: "A gracious revival is going on in the church of this place. This is the fourth week of Union services carried on by the pastors of the city in delightful accord. There is a mass meeting at 1 o'clock, a woman's meeting at 3, and the young people come together for half an hour before the evening service. All these services are held in the First Church, the Rev. A. J. Kerr, pastor, and the attendance has often crowded the spacious building.

At a General Conference of Foreign Missions held recently in New York, fourteen boards were represented, including the American Board, (Congregational), the different Presbyterian bodies—North, South, United, and Reformed; the Methodist boards of this country and Canada, the Baptists—North and South and Free, and the Disciples. Dr. Judson Smith said that he believed the most hopeful field for missions in the next decade would be China as it would be compelled by the present war to open the country to foreign intercourse as never before.

Taking an Island for Christ.

How a Little Band of Devoted Men and Women Began a Gospel Work on Dauphin Island, Ala.—Enduring Many Hardships and Privations, yet Trusting Always—A Work of Self-sacrifice that has Already Won Many Souls.

ALTHOUGH it is doubtless true that it would be difficult to find a place on this Continent where the glorious Gospel of Jesus has not been proclaimed, yet the story of missionary effort which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD publishes below, goes very far toward proving that there are still some localities where Gospel work of a pioneer character is very sorely needed.

For several years prior to 1893, Mr. and Mrs. O. E. Stombaugh had lived in Sioux City, Ia., where Mrs. Stombaugh had been engaged in Gospel and Temperance work, being State Evangelist for the Christian Workers' Association. Mrs. Stombaugh's heath failed, and a change of climate being advised, the family (including a daughter), went south to Alabama. But the hearts of all three were continually yearning for labor in the Master's vineyard, and Mrs. Stombaugh especially, despite the fact that she was an invalid, was loath to leave it. They had not been long in the South when a new field of activity was providentially opened. They learned that Dauphin Island, a secluded locality in the State of their adoption, lying at the entrance to Mobile Bay, was a neglected section and a field ripe for missionary work. Its population subsists mainly on fishing, oystering and crab-catching, the men being absent daily on the bays and creeks in summer, while the women cut wood for fires and did other domestic tasks at home.

Mrs. Stombaugh, in a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, relates how the resolution was formed to occupy Dauphin Island for Christ, and how it was carried into execution. What follows is substantially her own narrative, and it is all the more remarkable when it is explained that, even at the time of undertaking such an enterprise, the lady was still an invalid and that most of the time since she has been confined to her room, having only sufficient strength to be moved on Sundays to attend two services.

As related by these evangelists themselves, their pioneer missionary experience on Dauphin Island is full of interest. Nearly eighteen months ago, Rev. James H. Wine, an evangelist who had been doing excellent work in the Gospel field in Florida, came to Portersville, to attend a camp-meeting, by invitation of the camp meeting committee. At the close of the meeting, which had been greatly blessed, a conference was held by the evangelists at which the expediency of making Dauphin Island a base of operations was discussed, and the result of this consultation was that Rev. Mr. Wine, Rev. Mr. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Stombaugh, and Miss Stombaugh all decided to begin work there forthwith. A boat was obtained to convey the missionary party to the island, and J. W. Maxwell (a young convert) was both captain and pilot.

Connected with this short journey by water (uneventful in itself), Mrs. Stombaugh relates a touching incident as illustrating the uncertainty of human life. While young Maxwell (who has since gone to his reward) was steering the boat, and as it was nearing the shore, two persons were observed standing on the beach. They were Charles Steiner, a young convert, very active in temperance work, and the district school-teacher, Miss Susie Herring. Greeting the new arrivals warmly, they inquired if there would be a meeting that evening, and were answered in the affirmative. Both these young people were present at the meeting. Only a short time afterward the young lady was drowned in the vessel "Alice Graham," which was wrecked on the reef on Sunday, her entire crew perishing.

Once fairly at work in their new field, the evangelists found that it was a section in which the Gospel was, indeed, sorely needed. Many of the dwellers on Dauphin Island are wretchedly ignorant, and nearly all are poor in worldly possessions. Sunday with them is a day devoted to the occupation of oystering, in the season, and when this fails, the day is spent in raffles, and carousing. Until the evangelists came there was hardly a pretence of Sunday observance on the island. There was a good deal of real pioneering to be done. The home of the evangelists is a substantial log cabin (shown in our illustration), and although they have not many comforts, they still had abundant cause for rejoicing and thankfulness. For the services, they had a portable Tabernacle, which they had brought from Mobile, but after June they found it more agreeable to hold Gospel meetings and Sunday School under the trees in front of their own log cabin. On Sept. 15th last, the corner-stone was laid of the "Mission Church of the Christian Workers' Association of Dauphin Island," and since that time the meetings have been held in the new building.

THE HOME OF THE C. W. A. EVANGELISTS ON DAUPHIN ISLAND, MOBILE BAY, ALA.

From a photograph forwarded to "The Christian Herald" by Mrs. Stombaugh

Sickness and death have invaded the little colony during the past year. Malarial fever swept over the island, laying many low. On October 29, 1894, the aged mother of Mrs. Stombaugh was transferred to a heavenly home, both Mrs. Stombaugh and her daughter being very low at the time with the fever. Poverty, caused by the failure of the oyster season, was added to the other hardships of the community, and as if to put a climax to their troubles, a furious cyclone swept over the island, doing great damage, although no lives were lost. This visitation caused many of the people to turn to God for help and comfort.

Many notable instances of true Christian devotion have occurred in connection with the work. At Dauphin Island, as in many other localities with a rough population, the path of a young convert is often a stormy one. One woman who attended the meetings, did so in the face of threats to burn her house and cause bloodshed in her family. Her eldest son afterward signed the pledge and now three sons and two daughters attend the Sunday School. A man over sixty, who had spent a long life in intemperance and sin, became a convert and is now the Bible class teacher in the Sunday School, and several drunken and ungodly husbands have been prayed into the fold.

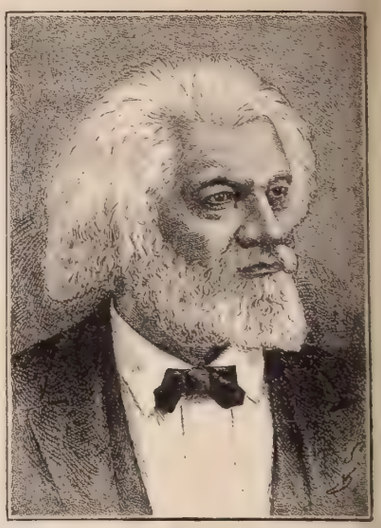
Church work is rapidly becoming well organized and already the energetic Gospel crusade carried on since the evangelists came to Dauphin Island is beginning to bear fruit. Their work, which is undenominational, is largely one of faith and they trust the bountiful Lord to provide for all their necessities in the future, as he has done hitherto. Already the classes of young men and women under Gospel instruction have become so large that additional teachers may soon be needed. One band of young women is the "Willing Workers," another is the "Bright Stars," and a company of small boys is the "Jewels," a band of the youngest girls is the "Merry-hearts," and the boys of like age are organized as the "Little Workers." Thus the sympathy and enthusiasm of nearly all are enlisted and aroused in the little community.

The people of Dauphin Island are not home-owners, being too poor to buy property, so they lease their holdings; yet though poor, they are kind-hearted. During the present winter they have had no district school and the mission is therefore maintaining instruction, secular and religious. Many are so poor that they are kept away from service through lack of clothing. Bible and Christian literature are at a premium among the population.

This little band of faithful workers has struggled along, discouraged at times, yet never despairing. They shared the burden of poverty that lay everywhere around them, and their own privations were not a few. At times some of them went barefoot for the lack of shoes, and even suffered for the necessaries of life; but their trust in the Lord never wavered for an instant. The few dresses belonging to the ladies of the mission were worn threadbare, and they were subjected to many hardships. Yet all kept at the work steadily and saw it spiritually prospering under their loving care. At intervals they are cheered by a helpful visit from associate workers in other parts of the country, and those are days of rejoicing. Among those who have come on these missions of encouragement and assisted at meetings and otherwise, are Rev. F. Alexander, of Portersville, Ala. and R. O. Coden, of Mobile, Ala. The prayers and good wishes of all who love the Lord and earnestly desire the spread of his Word will go out for the lone mission colony in its secluded island home in the Mexican Gulf.

A Noble Life Ended.

Frederick Douglass, Slave, Statesman, and Christian Advocate of His Race.



THE LATE FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

IN the fullness of years and while seemingly in the enjoyment of extraordinary health for a man of seventy-eight, Frederick Douglass, the colored orator and statesman died suddenly at his home in Washington on Feb. 20th.

For well-nigh a generation, Frederick Douglass had been regarded as the leader of the colored race in America. He represented it in political and legislative bodies and in press and on platform and his great ability no less than his courage and fidelity, won for him its love and gratitude.

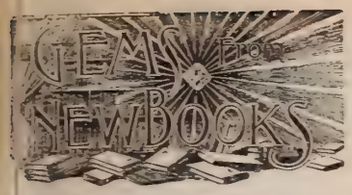
He was born about 1817. His early years were passed in the district of Tuckahoe, on the eastern shore of Maryland.

At the age of about ten years, Douglass was lent by his owner to some relatives in Baltimore, who treated the boy with great kindness, and under the care of his young mistress he learned the alphabet, and afterward taught himself to read and write. About six years later, however, his owner died, and Douglass passed into the ownership, by inheritance, of another master. Another change of a welcome character soon came in his lot when he was again sent to Baltimore to be the servant of his owner's brother. Here he was used badly and an opportunity occurring, Douglas succeeded in escaping to New Bedford, Mass. He spent some very unhappy years there. He was free, but he could not support himself. But he had a welcome chance of improving his mind which he did not neglect.

In 1846 a number of friends of Douglass, at the instance of Mrs. Henry Richards, of Baltimore, who took a deep interest in him, subscribed funds sufficient to purchase his freedom. His owner, Mr. Hugh Auld, executed a deed of manumission, and Douglass returned to America. He became intimate with John Brown, and a long correspondence passed between the two; but when it became evident that Brown was tending toward insurrection, Douglass left him. There were, however, letters found in Brown's carpet-bag from Douglass, which implicated him, and Douglass fled to Canada.

During the war Douglass was frequently at Washington, where he enjoyed the confidence of President Lincoln. After peace was concluded, he devoted himself to the work of elevating his race.

In recent years, Douglas was prominent in all movements having in view the social and political advancement of women, and the condition of the colored race.



COUNTING MERCIES.*

MISS THIRZA had a knack of giving her living apartments a pleasant look, and the few articles of furniture brought from Coldstream, being of antique pattern and thoroughly good in their w gave this one a quaint air of individual- nd rustic charm as indescribable as her peculiar attractions. It was as if the f verdure and freshness of a June day been suddenly dropped into the dust roar of a city street. It was alluring, ul and suggestive of good and holy gs; and to the young man came a swift n of his own early home and mother, y remembered nowadays. Ah, but don't I, Mr. Kennedy? And fo ne matter of that, who of us is grate- fu then? The fact is, when things are ju to our minds, we hardly notice them at ll, taking everything as a matter-of- co se; but let them go wrong once, and th what a hue and cry! ennedy laughed appreciatively, while Ether's face broke into a smile of broad d ght.

Oh, come now, Miss Bascom, did I de- s ve that? I am a lodger, but ain't I a 'r cy,' too? Don't I pay up by the clock, k p my boots off the bed, and always t e my second cup of coffee when you p e me? "Only, to be sure"—dropping i to a wheedling tone—"I sometimes am u fortunate about the latch-keys, a trifle u fortunate. You haven't seen"—

Oh, Mr. Kennedy, another one?" cried Ether aghast, "and this makes"—

THE NIGHT FAR SPENT.

The Difference Between the Church and the Kingdom, and the Prophetic Day and Night.

BY W. M.

IF the Christian Church were in truth—as so many Christian people erroneously suppose—the great kingdom of prophecy—that "Kingdom of the Heavens" for the establishment of which on this earth we are taught continually to pray, St. Paul would not have written to the Romans: "Knowing the time, that now it is high time for you to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light" (Rom. 13:11,12). For clearly it is to his Christian brethren—i.e., to members of the Church, whose truest definition is "the congregation of all faithful people," that the apostle is here speaking. "It is high time for you to awake out of sleep"—you whose "salvation is nearer than when we first became Christian believers." Here, then, we have men who have been redeemed by the blood of Christ, cleansed by the washing of regeneration, and sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, spoken of as still covered by the shadows of the night; still needing to be awakened out of sleep; still uncrowned with the anticipated great salvation. In what sharp contrast with this is the language of the same apostle, in another epistle: "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that the day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night, nor of the darkness" (1 Thess. 5:4-8).

And yet there is no real contradiction between these two Scriptures. All that is needed in order to harmonize them, is that we understand what are the night and darkness spoken of. True believers are even now "children of the light and of the day," the day-star has already arisen in their hearts; but they are still walking in what St. Paul calls "this present darkness" (Eph. 6:12); waiting and watching for that long-promised and radiant "morning without clouds," which will only come when "the Sun of Righteousness shall arise, with healing in his wings."

Let us look at some of the most marked characteristics—first, of the "night" whose approaching termination the great apostle so confidently predicted; and, secondly, of the glorious day which he so exultantly anticipated.

The night, then, which St. Paul even in his day regarded as far spent, is the night of nature's darkness. Its shadows fell upon the groves of the lost Eden, when man's sin had dimmed its primal sunshine, and its wailing winds awoke when he was driven out and heard the clang of its closing gates behind him. Since then, from the fall of primal man and his kingdom, on to the glorious manifestation of the Lord from heaven, the whole period of earth's history is regarded in Scripture as the time of night and darkness. Since then the whole creation has been made subject to vanity; it has groaned and travailed in pain together even until now; its flowers have faded, its fruits have failed, its fields have withered. Above all, the moral night has been deep and abiding; "darkness has covered the earth, and gross darkness the people." Oh! long and weary night, shall it never end? Yes: even when St. Paul wrote, four thousand years of it had passed away, and therefore it was verily true that "the night was far spent." But, if true then, how emphatically true is it now, for how much nearer are we to that blessed day when "the creation itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God."

Again, the night to which the Apostle refers is the night of Satan's dominion. In Eph. 6: 12, we read: "For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, the powers, against the world-rulers of this darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places." As long then, as Satan rules, not only in the hearts of men and the government of the nations, as we are taught in the Book of Daniel, but in some sort over the powers of nature, the night must continue, and not till he is bound and imprisoned can the morning dawn. The night, though "far spent," will not be passed till the oppressive curse be removed—till Satan is bound—till the Lord has come.

SAVING A SOUL.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Mar. 17. Acts 8: 26-39.

WE are apt to talk somewhat loosely about saving souls. The figures sometimes quoted at the close of a revival campaign, and the joy manifested at a certain number of souls being saved, may convey a very inadequate impression of the kind of work that is done. In a general way, the idea accepted of a soul being saved is that it is saved from everlasting punishment. Probably that is the predominant idea in the minds of a majority of the converts themselves at the outset. But they soon discover, if they are really converted, that it means much more than that. The unsaved soul would go to its own place voluntarily. It would find only there congenial environment. The soul that loves sin would of its own accord when it leaves the body, go to the place where sin abounds. It would not expect to be happy anywhere else. Ask a man now when he is happiest, what gives him the greatest gratification, what is his idea of the greatest bliss. If he answers truthfully and honestly, it is easy to see from his answer what is the condition of his soul, whether it is saved or not. The condition after death is merely the fruition of the present state. On nothing is the Scripture more emphatic than that he that is filthy now will be filthy then; and he that is righteous now will be righteous then. The state beyond the grave is fixed by the natural law of development, not by arbitrary decree. The sinner makes his own hell and if he persists in making it and preparing it here he has no ground of complaint against God for his condition there. We need have no difficulty in reconciling the idea of hell with the idea of God's inexhaustible love. The loving father who sees his son taking to drink and vice expostulates with him and points out to him that he will bring himself to ruin. He tells him that he is being deceived, that such ways, however pleasant they may be at the beginning, always end in misery. He takes him to the hospital and the poor house, and shows him the disease and poverty to which men have come who began as he is beginning. He pleads with him not to sin against himself, and assures him that he is laying up misery for his old age. Excluding for the moment any idea of God, sin is seen to be a wrong against the man himself. We know, because we see it often, that if the man persists in drinking, he will have delirium tremens. It is natural cause and effect. So it is beyond the grave. The proclivities of life are simply continued in new conditions. God, as a loving Father, pleads with men not to wrong themselves. He sees the consequences of their course, and entreats them to quit sin and seek after righteousness. When a man, by the power of the Holy Spirit through Christ, turns his back on sin, hates it, loathes it, and strives after purity and righteousness, and counts the attainment of goodness the highest and best thing in life, that man's soul is saved. It is saved from the control of the flesh, saved from the debasing and corrupting influence of the lower nature and begins to live. He turns from the downward path, which is easy because his lower nature is in harmony with it as the path of self-indulgence, and begins to toil upward, while his lower nature resists and drags him back, and the world lays snares for his feet so that he may fall and be discouraged. And here is the aim and motive and purpose of all preaching and Christian effort. It is to show the sinner that he is committing an irreparable blunder, that he is willfully contracting a disease that will entail hard suffering; to get him to seek better things, and when he gets discouraged and realizes his own inability to do what he is urged to do, to tell him of Christ's power and assure him that divine help is given to every one who wants it and will ask for it. Thus souls are saved.

NEW Y. M. C. A. AT NEW ORLEANS.

The Young Men's Christian Association of New Orleans had a day of joyful celebration on January 26. With appropriate ceremonies, and in the presence of a large company of eminent men the corner stone of the building which is to be its home, was laid. A picture of the building as it will appear when completed appears on this page. One of the most delighted and enthusiastic of the company present was Mr. J. H. Keller, who had given the Association the land on which to erect its home. The venerable and venerated Rev. Dr. Palmer, whose name has so long been associated with the city's best work was also one of the welcome guests. Dr. Sessums, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Louisiana, gave the address of the day. Referring to the prejudice existing in some quarters against united unsectarian work, he said: "Any individual life that undertakes to follow this example of Christ's great love for humanity, and any organization of that sort can teach much to those established institutions that call themselves churches. The method of united action in this Association teaches unity. That does not mean belief in a platform of doctrines, but a unification of man in the practical welfare of men. The ideal of Christian unity is men united in belief in God with the liberty of speculative doctrinal thought, but without liberty or latitude as regards the duty of man to man. Christianity leaves no room for doubt as to that. So, then, I pray, I believe that this Association's future is to be an even nobler and grander continuation of the work of the past and of the present, to maintain as its glory the strength of religion and to show that the spirit is not weak because it is invisible, but that the still, small voice of God stills the storms in human life and enables men to go on with this work of perfecting and raising man to God."

The Association which has the gratification of building this beautiful home for itself, is entering on its twentieth year. It was founded in 1876 and in spite of many adverse circumstances has made continuous progress and has been growing in favor from the beginning. With its new building, its spacious gymnasium and its well-filled library and reading-room, it may hope for a large increase in its popularity and usefulness.

THE DESTITUTION IN THE WEST.

As a special appeal was made in this department several weeks ago on behalf of the starving and destitute people in the West, it is fitting that a special acknowledgment of the generous response should also be made here. The young people of the various societies to whom we appealed proved that they were animated by the true spirit of the Master, who fed the hungry while he was upon earth and showed compassion for all who were in need. Beside the gifts of money that flowed in from the societies, barrels, boxes and packages of clothing and provisions were received from thirty-nine Societies of Christian Endeavor, twenty-five Epworth Leagues, and twenty-two Circles of King's Daughters. These were duly forwarded to the West and distributed among the most needy by our own missionary and acknowledgment has been made of them with other gifts in this journal. But here we wish to thank the societies directly for their prompt and liberal response to our appeal and assure them that the people to whom these gifts were sent, were deeply grateful for this relief in their extremity.

KING'S DAUGHTERS AMONG THE LUMBERMEN.

A disaster, evidently the work of some malicioas person whose interests are served by the degradation of the lumbermen of Michigan, has fallen on the work ot the King's Daughters in that State. Young People of Angola.

Group of Bright Loanda Boys who Have had Christian Training.

ANGOLA, on the West Coast of South Africa, is one of the favored provinces of that country in which the Gospel has been preached for many years. It is a Portuguese colony, with an area of about 200,000 square miles, and the hot climate, for most Europeans and Americans, is an unhealthy one, especially along the coast. The soil is very fertile, and the vegetation luxuriant and beautiful, nature producing spontaneously almost everything that is needed to support human life. It has a mixed population of two million negroes, mulattoes and whites. While nearly all are above the standard of intelligence of most West African colonies, probably the highest in point of education are the people of Amboca, where reading and writing are general accomplishments. In the interior of Angola, the native paganism still prevails, except in certain localities where Christian mission work has made a bright oasis in the spiritual desert.

SULPICIO HOLENZOLLERN.

In the city of St. Paul de Loanda (the capital), there is a very marked difference between the population and that of the interior. European influences, the advantages of education and the opportunities for Christian training have done much for the young people of Loanda. A typical group of native young men is presented in the illustration on this page, almost all of whom have been fairly educated, and some of whom occupy positions in government employ, while others are in mercantile offices connected with the shipping interests of the seaport.

Sulpicio Holenzollern, a young Christian Angolan, and a protege of Mr. Heli Chatelain, missionary and explorer (formerly United States Consul at Loanda), came to the United States three years ago to complete his education at Howard University, Washington, D. C., with the ultimate purpose of returning to his native country as a surveyor and teacher. He was trained at one of Bishop Taylor's Mission schools by Mrs. Jeanette Rosemond, who labored in Africa for several years. He became proficient also in French, English, Portuguese and K'Mbundu, the latter being the language common to the whole province, while Portuguese is chiefly spoken in Loanda. All missionaries who go to the Angola field have to learn K'Mbundu before they can hope to succeed with the work. Sulpicio, during the intervals of his studies at Howard University, has been employed in various capacities, as the support of an aged relative at home devolved upon him. He is a bright, young fellow of considerable promise. In Loanda, where the Portuguese Government affords liberal opportunities of advancement to young men, the proportion of natives in its service is much larger than that of foreigners. This is an incentive to study and to honest ambition, which is found in few parts of Africa.

Experience has demonstrated that the native African, trained in childhood and continued under favorable conditions, is capable of a considerable degree of culture. This is particularly true of many localities along the West Coast. Not a few have become successful mission workers among their own people while others have shown abilities in various directions. The young men of Loanda are an encouraging illustration of the results of civilized training.

An Italian Child's Prayer.

A young reader (Amelia Thropp, Oil City, Pa.), sends us the following verse of an old evening prayer, said by the Tuscan "contadini" at close of day:

I bend my head, and let my forehead lie,
Low on my pillow, thinking I must die!
I call on blessed Jesus in my fear:
He says, "Thou canst not perish, I am here."

The verse was translated by Francesca Alexander, of Florence, Italy, a well-known authoress, some of whose books were edited by John Ruskin. The simple petition has been a great comfort to many Italian children.

The Pleasures of Coasting.

Within sight of my window, writes Dr. Talmage, the procession of sleds flying down hill and crawling up—for what genuine boy would not walk up to ride down?—the shout of demonstrative glee, the clear sweep of fun that imperilled neither life nor limb, have been something for all good men and women to smile over and rejoice in. That is the way our youth are to get nerve and muscle and exuberance for the work they will be called to do when they arrive amid the twenties and the thirties and the forties and the fifties of earnest life. The boys who skate no pond, strike no ball, fly no kite, trundle no hoop, coast no hill, will have no strength for the work of coming life.

The way to crowd out bad amusements is to increase innocent amusements. When your boy is dead, if that overwhelming grief should ever strike your soul, you will feel more satisfaction in thinking of what pleasures you gave him than what unnecessary self-denials you inflicted upon him. In all the questions that come up between men and boys, count me on the side of the boys.

Armenian and Kurdish Women.

Col. Norton, an English traveler, in describing a journey from Trebizonde to Bitlis, gives this interesting episode: "At one place, a fairly well-to-do Armenian told me that his daughter was the greatest beauty in the land. She was recently married and forbidden to unveil herself or even speak to her brother-in-law; but in his paternal pride he wished I could see her to know how lovely she was. I consented, and the lady at last appeared, but only when the room had been cleared of all the males but the proud father, the husband and myself. She was dressed and adorned for the occasion, and being thus privileged to see a splendid specimen of femine beauty, I warmly complimented him on her good looks. She bent down and kissed my hand, but never raised her long, drooping lashes to my face. As a contrast to this fair creature, I stopped one night at the underground habitation of another hybernating Kurd brigand, whose charming unveiled daughter, Nazli (or "bold in her bashful innocence," for the Turks have this expressive word that would describe her), marched up uninvited, regarded me with a comical look of contempt, and after a prolonged stare exclaimed, "Ingliz!" and, bursting into a merry peal of laughter, led me by the hand up to a favorite cow, milked her into a little brass cup called a "tasse," and offered me the warm and frothing liquid, which I did not fancy, but drained off gallantly to her health. This illustration will best describe how the two races contrast with regard to women."

Children and Riches.

Don't teach your children to set too great a valuation upon money, or to view the making of it as the chief purpose of their lives. At the close of his career, the celebrated John Wesley said to a group of his parishioners: "After having served you between sixty and seventy years, let me add one word more. I am pained for you who are rich in this world. Do you give all you can? 'Nay; may I not do what I will with my own?' you reply. Here lies your mistake. It is not your own. It cannot be, unless you are lord of heaven and earth. Who gave you this addition to your fortune? Do you know that God intrusted you with that money for his work? 'But I must provide for my children.' Certainly But how? By making them rich? Then you will probably ruin them. 'What shall I do then?' Lord, speak to their hearts else I speak in vain. Leave them enough to live, not in idleness, but honest industry. And if you have no children, upon what principle can you leave a dollar behind more than enough to bury you?"

Just as it is when comes the evening hour:
The most are weary—some have gone to rest,
The babes, the aged, and the feeble ones;
The strong and active stay awhile and talk
Of all that has been done and is to do,
Of the day's happenings and the ones asleep,
Of what will make them glad when morning comes;
And in the intervals of play or work
The eye of each is lifted now and then
To note the hour upon the old clock's face
Whose heart outbeats so long the human one.
Then comes the thought that it is growing late,
That very soon we, too, must go to sleep.
O, what a sweet comfort that from first to last,
Sleeping or waking—all are in God's home,
And one paternal roof doth cover all.

PREACHING TO CHILDREN.

THE mistake many preachers make, writes an esteemed pastor, is in preaching to adults only, as though no children were present. It is not strange that that kind of preaching fails to reach children, and to secure their regular attendance at the services of the church. A minister was once wondering how he could reach the large number of children in the homes of his people.

"How am I to get them all interested in the church?" he said. "To be sure they attend Sunday School, but that is not enough. I seldom see them at the preaching services, and never on Wednesday night at prayer-meeting." As a rule the children do not attend these services. Parents do not require it, because the minister so often takes no thought of the children in the preparation of his sermons, and only preaches to the older ones.

It is said that once upon a time it was announced from a certain pulpit, that on the following Sunday the pastor would like as many of the children of the Sunday School as would attend the morning service to take seats in the gallery, as they could all sit in a body. He especially asked the teachers of the Sunday Schools to urge the children to come. He would "preach a sermon for the children." Sunday came, and so did a goodly number of the children. When it came time for the sermon, the minister glanced up in the in the gallery and said: "Girls and boys, it gives me great pleasure to have so many bright faces before me this morning. I wish you would come every Sunday and fill up all of those vacant seats." Then he went into his sermon with a will.

But he soon forgot "the gallery." He just soared right over their little heads way up in the arches in the roof, and only came down long enough to speak to some of the boys that were whispering a little too loud. Then he went back to the roof.

Early Self-Denial.

A distinctive feature of the child-training of the ancient Spartans was the rigid discipline of constant self-denial, to which the child was subjected from infancy onward. And this feature of child-training among that people had much to do with giving to the Spartans their distinguishing characteristics of simplicity of manners, of powers of endurance, and of dauntless bravery. The best primitive peoples everywhere have recognized the pre-eminent importance of this feature of child-training. Its neglect has come only with the growth in luxury among peoples of the highest material civilization. The question is an important one, whether it is well to lose all the advantages of this method of training, simply because it is not found to be a necessity as a means of sustaining physical life, where wealth abounds so freely. It is not that a child is to be denied what he thinks he wants, merely for the sake of the denial itself; but it is that a child ought not to have what he wants merely because he wants it. It is not that there is a necessary gain in a denial to a child; but it is that when a denial to a child is necessary, there is an added gain to him through his finding that he must do without what he longs for. It is every parent's duty to deny a child many things which he wants; to teach him that he must get along without a great many things which seem very desirable; to train him to self-denial and endurance, at the table, in the play-room, with companions, and away from them; and the doing of this duty by the parent brings a sure advantage to the child. Whatever else he has, a child ought not to lack this element of a wise training.

CHAPTER XLIV.

To Serve in Small Things.

VERY thoughfully Annie walked homeward after her conversation with her mentor. The view Mrs. Somers had pressed upon her was inspiring, although in some aspects discouraging. This deliverance from sin, this perfect holiness was, if Mrs. Somers was right, the result of a slow and painful process. Annie had hoped, from what she had heard and read, that in a moment, by an act of Almighty power, the chains would be cast off and she would be set free. It looked now as if she must not expect that, but must work out her own salvation with fear and trembling, God working in her. She might count on the power, and the weapons of conflict; but she must use them herself. She must not lie passive and wait for a change to be effected. Was this so? Annie thought of the books she had been reading, and wondered if Mrs. Somers could be right. She would go right home and take the books and her Bible into her own room and compare them and see what light she could get. Even if she spent the whole day in the study, it would pay. This matter she must be sure about.

But two pairs of bright eyes were watching for her from an upper window and "Mamma, mamma," greeted her ears as she entered her home. Wally and Roy had an appeal to present against Mabel, and there must be a hearing of their complaint and of Mabel's defence. The grievance was the product of a wrong of several days back and several matters had to be set right lest there should be any ill-feeling left to rankle in the children's minds. Then to cement the reconciliation, Mamma must take all three out for a little excursion. Callers were waiting for Annie on her return and so the hours slipped by and in the evening Annie thought regretfully how different the day had been from the one she sketched in the morning. It had often been so and she fretted at the frequency with which her plans were thwarted. Perhaps she was too weak and yielding to lead a saintly life. What would be the result if her time was frittered away thus? As usual she carried her trouble to Mrs. Somers.

That lady looked delightfully calm when Annie entered her pretty room. She greeted her visitor with a sweet smile and said, "You look worried, dear, what is the trouble?"

"It is so hard, Mrs. Somers, to be a faithful wife and mother and yet do your duty as a child of God."

"No, my child, it is not hard. There you mistake. Whatever you do, don't fall into this error. I came near slipping here myself, and I must save you. Paul says, "Whatsoever you do, do it heartily, as to the Lord and not to men." Habituate yourself to doing everything for God; look at your work in this way, as work for him, and every trivial duty will appear so different, and you will accomplish it easier and with more satisfaction to yourself. What is [illegible] service for God?"

"But there are so many little things mothers have to do which cannot be classed with these things. I would be so glad to go out with you oftener among your poor, and to teach in your Sabbath School. Sometimes my heart rebels a little, when I cannot attend divine service, but I read my Bible and try to be patient."

"My dear child, the duties of wife and mother and housewife are not trivial. Our Father knows what they are, and is ready to give strength for their performance. Did you ever think that Christ's first miracle was performed to help a housekeeper out of a difficulty?"

"No, I never thought of it, but it is true."

"He is not above aiding us in these things. He does not go to church with us and leave us at our doors when we come home. No, indeed, he accompanies us in, and follows us in the various little details of duties. I am glad the inspired penman says Jesus loved Martha as well as Mary. I sympathize with the Marthas of earth; and I have often wondered whether Martha would not have loved to have sat at Jesus' feet with Mary, but felt she could not. Were there no Marthas now, how many unhappy husbands and children there would be, for if there were only Marys, they might suffer. Let us go back to our former subject—service to God in home duties. Take an instance. You are reading your Bible, deeply intent upon its sacred truths, when your child comes crying, has fallen into water and wet his clothes, or his shoes hurt him, perhaps a rock has slipped under his foot; or, little impatient one, he is half-sick and irritable, and wants mamma to put her book away, rock him and tell him a pretty story. By which would you serve God better?"

"Ah! I do not like those interruptions, but I would be compelled to lay aside my book under the circumstances, yet I am afraid I should sigh a little."

"You should not, for these attentions to your child, even to the pretty story, is serving God fully as much as reading your Bible, or talking to a sinner about his soul. You pray for the Christian graces; is not patience one? Let patience have her perfect work. Let us take another instance. Your favorite minister is in town, and he is a true soul-feeder, and knowing that he will preach on the coming Sunday, you pray through the week to be in the spirit on that day, pray that your soul may be fed with heavenly manna, and that it may be indeed a Sabbath of rest to your soul. You rejoice in the treat in store for your hungry soul. The Sabbath dawns, bright and beautiful, and you are ready, but Roy is drooping; begs mamma to stay and hold him in her arms. He has fever; your husband's delicate touch distinguishes it; the quick bounding throbs of the transparent temples show it, and his hot breath is on your cheek! Disappointed and sick at heart you take off your hat, and a sigh escapes your lips, and a tear strays down your cheek, as your husband drives off without you. Would the house of God have been any more a temple of service than your home with your sick child? Verily, there are many mistakes made right here."

"I see it, Mrs. Somers, but I never saw it before," and Annie's eyes were full of tears. "From this time forth, I will take a different view of home duties, and will, hereafter, perform them more cheerfully."

"Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might. If you make a dress for Mabel, make it as perfectly as possible; if you make a loaf of bread, make it just as light as you can, not to excel your neighbor, but to obey God. Glorify him with your whole body. I think of this as I go to our sewing society, and all of the members should be actuated by the same spirit. As I go, I pray, Oh! God, let me now glorify thee with my tongue and fingers!"

"There is one other thing, Mrs. Somers, which troubles me. After I began work in earnest, I worked systematically, for I knew little was accomplished in life without order and system. Now, I find myself forming plans as I open my eyes in the morning, and when, as generally happens, new duties present themselves and break up my plans, I feel dissatisfied with myself and with my work."

"This is apt to be the case with systematic people, but you must always lay your plans with a capital IF at the front, and let it be the Generalissimo of the battalion of duties. Disappointment will set easier then, for you will be in part prepared for it. 'Charity seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked.'"

"Must I not plan then, or just let duties come as they will?"

"By all means plan for your day's duties. Put if before you, and then go to work as energetically as though you were soon to reach the end. If, however, something else comes in, go out of the routine, do the new work, and then go back and take up the thread and go to weaving again, right where you left off."

"And do you think that all these little disappointments tend to growth—these little home duties that I thought too trifling for the great God to notice—do these tend to the sanctification of the soul?"

"Most certainly, most assuredly! There is one thing I would impress upon you, my dear child, upon myself and upon every Christian: that one reason we toil upward slowly, oh! how slowly, is because we carry a heavy burden with us, and this burden is an unsanctified will. We wish for sanctification, but it is only a passing desire. Our will must be lost in the Divine will."

"Oh, Mrs. Somers, if my will were only sanctified—if it were only submerged in God's will!"

"Don't be discouraged because it still struggles. Press on, fight on, it will come after awhile. Many sink in despair because they progress so slowly; remember this, and don't be cast down, only push on. Keep this before you, the way to the earthly Jerusalem is rough, and the city lies up, far above the traveller. He must now climb, but soon he must descend into deep valleys, and Jerusalem is lost to sight. Up again he mounts and the city again rises before him; then down again he goes into the vale, but whether on the hill top with Jerusalem in full view, or deep down in the dark valley and Jerusalem hidden, still he is drawing nearer, and at last will stand within its walls. So is the road to the heavenly Jerusalem. The way is rough and long; there are hill tops where views of transcendent beauty greet the eye and Jerusalem seems just over there; but down again in the dark valley the spirits flag, hope grows dim, for the way seems lost; no Jerusalem in sight. But the city is there still though we cannot see it and we are drawing near.

"It was in the wilderness that manna was sent; the valley of Baca was made a well, the rain came from heaven and filled the pools. Struggle out of the valley, my child, aim for the mountain tops; but remember whether in the one or on the other, each step carries you one nearer Jerusalem. Be not faint, be not weary, press on, step by step, mount upward."

CHAPTER XLV.

Farewell.

By many such conversations as that in the foregoing chapter, did the experienced Christian labor to help her younger sister in the faith. Spiritual difficulties although peculiar to the individual are often very similar, and the means by which one person's difficulties is removed will frequently be found effectual in the difficulty of another. Annie laid bare her soul before her friend and if she could not always get the light she sought, she could at least find a sympathetic listener and the two women would kneel together and pray to their common Lord for his guidance. The friendship was very sweet and helpful on both sides. Annie's knowledge of the world and more cultured mind gave vigor and breadth to the more restricted, somewhat narrow ideas of Mrs Somers and led her to look outside the little circle which she was apt to think of as the world. On the other hand, Annie was helped by her friend to deeper spirituality and to stronger faith. So, in mutual helpfulness the friendship became very precious on both sides.

One depressing feature of it was the state of Mrs. Somers' health. At first Annie noticing her debility thought she had overworked, as she was apt to do. But a period of rest, to which Mrs Somers reluctantly consented, did not bring the expected recuperation Annie grew more and more anxious as the weeks passed without marked improvement. The sufferer herself did not seem alarmed, though she grieved over the many services she would have liked to render to others, but could not on account of her weakness.

"I wish, dear," she said one day to her husband, "you would look in on Mrs. Somers. I cannot understand her continued weakness. I am afraid there must be some radical trouble otherwise she would have overcome it before this. She does not seem to consider it necessary to consult you professionally, but if you were to call in an incidental way she might be led to talk of herself and you might get a clue to her ailment."

"Certainly, Annie, I will see her to-day. I have plenty of excuses for calling. She has proteges all around who are inquiring for her and I can give her news of them and incidentally look into her own case."

Annie felt thankful and several times in the course of the day the thought of having brought her husband's tact and skill into service on her friend's behalf reassured her. In the evening hearing Dr. Gordon's voice she went into his room eager for his report.

"It is not good, dear," said Dr. Gordon seriously, "you must be brave and strong as your friend is, for there is sorrow before you. I had no difficulty in learning all the particulars. Mrs. Somers was glad to tell me though I think she had no hope. Her mother died in much the same way, it appears. Her symptoms are precisely the same and medical science is powerless in those cases."

"But you will try, will you not?"

"All I can do is to alleviate her suffering, if she should suffer but cure is impossible. She is near the end."

Annie burst into tears. "My dear friend, my sister, my guide!"

Annie would have gone to her that night, but her husband assured her that it would not be kind. "Her life," he said, "hangs by a hair and the slightest agitation would prove fatal. The last stage in her case is likely to be very rapid and she has certainly entered upon it."

The next day, however, under pledge to Dr. Gordon to be calm, Annie went. Mrs. Somers had not risen and Annie knelt by the bedside and kissed her hand. The tears would come, but she did not raise her head until she had controlled them.

"Do not weep, dear Annie," said the sufferer. "It is only for a little while. I will be there to welcome you when you come. You will look after my poor friends whom I leave behind and I shall be at rest about them. I am just waiting now for the summons and I have a presentiment that it is upon its way."

It was nearer than either of them thought. Annie stayed all day greedily drinking in the sweet words of the departing saint. Toward evening she was about to light the lamp when Mrs. Somers prevented her. "I like this solemn twilight," she said. "Sit by me and sing for me. 'Sing, 'Abide with me.' Annie took the low seat near the bed and holding the thin hand in her own sang softly. As she finished the precious hymn there was a convulsive movement in the hand and then it lay nerveless in her clasp. She was alone.

She went out of the chamber of death without a tear. She was awed, solemnized but not distressed. It was her Lord who had come and called her friend, and she could bear it at his hand. With a new consecration of herself, she took up her life. She searched out the people whom Mrs. Somers had befriended, and tried to fill her place in their lives. Her own spiritual life grew, for, bereft of her friend, she carried her troubles to Christ himself, and found Almighty help. It was really better so. She led a very busy life, and was the light of many homes. In her own family and in the family at the home of her girlhood, and in the abodes of the poor, she was a ministering angel, loved and revered, as one who lived very near to God. When I think of that beautiful life and contrast it with the life which as a girl she had planned for herself, and contrast the saintly matron with the frivolous girl, I feel that I was quite justified in calling her story "The New-Fashioned Woman."

VERY MOTHER SHOULD Have it in the House

A Valuable Book.

It is not generally known, but it is a fact recognized by physicians, that a very large majority of the diseases of mankind begin with irritation and inflammation in that part of the body which becomes affected by the disease. Inflammation is an unhealthy condition of the tissues, manifested externally by heat, redness and swelling, internally by congestion of the blood vessels, causing pain, disease and growth of unsound tissue. It is very important that every person should understand the nature and the treatment of inflammations. For this purpose, I. S. JOHNSON & Co., 22 Custom House St., Boston, Mass., have had compiled from the highest medical authorities for family use, an illustrated book, entitled "TREATMENT FOR DISEASES." The book contains a description of all ailments caused by or accompanied with inflammation, alphabetically arranged; also the treatment for such. The book is printed in plain, simple language that all can understand. It is a valuable and complete treatise which everyone should have for ready reference. The publishers will send one copy in paper covers, to any person on receipt of their name, address and a two cent stamp for postage. S. JOHNSON & Co., 22 Custom House St., Boston.

A LOVING SPIRIT.

A LITTLE word of kindness,
Like a sunbeam from above;
On a heart bowed down with sorrow,
Veils a soul that's full of love.

In doing acts of kindness
None will e'er be done in vain;
God will not forget the doer,
Serving him is work of gain.

Precious word for Jesus spoken
Illumes many a darkened sky;
Righteousness shall be the token
In that happy home on high.

ELI BROWN.

FREE.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

A SCEPTIC'S INQUIRY.

A sceptic seeing an aged hermit go by Barefoot, stopped to question him. "Father," said he, "you are in a very miserable condition if there is not another world." "True, son," said the hermit, "but what is thy condition if there is? Man is a creature designed for two different states of being, or rather for two different lives. His first life is short and transient; his second permanent and lasting. The question we are all concerned in is this, in which of these two lives it is our chief interest to make ourselves happy. We make provisions for this life as though it were never to have an end, and for the other life as though it were never to have a beginning."

SEED TESTING EXTRAORDINARY.

The great development of the seed industry in America is nowhere better exemplified than on the large seed farm of W. ATLEE BURPEE & Co., at FORDHOOK,—located among the Bucks County hills in Pennsylvania,—a name now as familiar among seed growers and buyers as a household word.

"Tried and True" is the motto carried out at FORDHOOK, and for this purpose fourteen acres are set apart as trial grounds, in which this summer 6722 tests are being made in order to prove the genuineness of all seeds and the value of new introductions in their relative merits with existing varieties. Varieties under the same name, but from different firms and from different countries, are also brought side by side, thus enabling the grower to see at a glance the value and character of each. So, for this reason, a visit to FORDHOOK FARM is of the greatest benefit to the scientist, the seed grower, and the seedsman alike.

Too much credit cannot be given to MR. W. ATLEE BURPEE, the head of the great Philadelphia firm, for the energy he has displayed and the capital he has expended in order to make the experiments carried out at this perfect model farm of the utmost value, not only to himself, but to the whole nation, a fact proven by his throwing the farm open to the public on certain days in the week. To those interested in the trade it is always open.—From a long illustrated article in THE FLORISTS' EXCHANGE, New York, September 29, 1894.

To give an insight into our methods, we have published "A YEAR'S WORK AT FORDHOOK FARM," with many beautiful half-tone illustrations from photographs.

This new book has been prepared to lay before the reader, in an attractive manner, by the united efforts of pen and camera, an exact, comprehensive, and impartial picture of FORDHOOK, precisely as it appears to the eyes of the average man or woman visiting the Farm.

We regret that we cannot afford to send a copy of this little book with every catalogue for 1895, but to do so would cost more than ten thousand dollars extra for printing and postage. Although the regular price is 10 Cents (or free as a premium with a dollar order), we will, upon receipt of two 2-cent stamps, mail a copy to the address of any planter who desires to consult it before sending this season's order for seeds. Shall we mail YOU a copy NOW? ☞ Perhaps you would also like to have "A BRIGHT BOOK about SEEDS" mailed FREE to any address.

The International Lesson Committee,

Who by their Selections Guide Ten Million Sunday School Scholars throughout the World in Systematic and Simultaneous Biblical Study.

SOCIETIES, committees, and organizations of every kind abound in the religious world of our day and each has its special circle of God's people who are interested in it and the particular work it has undertaken in Christ's vineyard. It may safely be claimed, however, that no organization is in touch with so large a community as is the Committee whose portraits appear on this page. It is estimated that in the Sunday schools of the United States, Canada and Europe there are gathered every Sunday, scholars teachers and officers to the number of twenty-three millions. A large and ever increasing proportion of this vast number study the same part of God's Word on the same day. What that portion shall be, is decided by the fifteen eminent men whose portraits we give. The honor equally with the responsibility of the duty is fully realized on all hands, and we believe that there is no Sunday School throughout the world that will not be glad to see these portraits and that will not regard them as a treasure.

The Committee was appointed in 1890 by the International Sunday School Convention which that year met at Pittsburgh, Pa. Three times before that—in 1872, 1878 and 1884, the conventions had appointed committees for the same purpose. That those committees had performed their duty to the satisfaction of the Sunday School workers may be inferred from the fact that of the fifteen members appointed in 1890, thirteen had served on the previous committee and four—Dr. J. H. Vincent, Dr. Warren Randolph, Dr. John Hall and Mr. B. F. Jacobs had served on every one of the three committees.

Their duties were defined by the resolution which appointed the first committee in 1872. They were "to select a course of Bible Lessons for a series of years, not exceeding seven, which shall embrace as far as possible a general study of the whole Bible, alternating between the Old and New Testaments, semi-annually or quarterly as they may deem best." Later, additional instructions were given as to special lessons such as Temperance and Foreign Missions, and these were carried out. The concurrence of the English Sunday School Union in the arrangement led to the appointment of a Corresponding Committee there which has co-operated with the American Committee. The plan adopted has been to prepare in outline the plan of lessons for the year and then send it to England for criticism or suggestion. When the report of the English committee arrives another meeting is held, at which the various suggestions made are considered and, if approved, embodied in the plan.

Whatever criticism of their work there has been,—and it was inevitable that there would be criticism in a work that affected so large a number of intelligent persons—there is a general unanimity in the approval of the principle adopted. Never has there been a time when young people have had a better idea of the Bible as a whole, or have been so conversant with all its parts. Dr. Trumbull in his Yale lecture quotes an alumnus of one of the choicest Christian Colleges of New England, as saying of a young man then under eighteen years of age that, "he knows more of the Bible on entering college than I knew of it when I left the theological seminary, for he has had advantages in Bible study such as we knew nothing of in Sunday School or in the seminary in my day." The advantages to which he referred were those that the system of International Lessons has called into existence. When it was realized that the majority of the Sunday Schools in this country and a large number in Europe would on a certain day, study a certain passage of Scripture, all the resources of Christian scholarship and all the suggestions of experienced teachers were called forth and concentrated on that passage, with the object of helping the teacher to properly instruct his class. Beside this, there were all the advantages which come from systematic study. It would be impossible to learn history, science or philosophy by the discursive system, or no-system, that formerly prevailed in the Sunday School; and it was impossible to teach the Bible so. After ten years in regular attendance at the Sunday School a child might have but a very vague idea of the Bible as a whole, however familiar he might be with certain parts of it. But, by the system now adopted he is familiarized with the whole book from lid to lid. And in addition to these advantages there is the one which always comes from united effort and the mutual help derived from association in common study.

The system was not inaugurated without difficulty. Mr. B. F. Jacobs said in a recent speech that "no man had any right to special honor in this matter." Probably he would not find any one else with that opinion who knows anything of the matter in question. If Mr. Jacobs and Dr. J. H. Vincent had not labored with untiring energy, and infinite tact and good humor, the adoption of such a system as the International, might have been indefinitely postponed. The problem was in many minds but the difficulties seemed insurmountable. The way had been prepared before the convention of 1872 by the American Sunday School Union's annual series of question books and Dr. Vincent had shown in his "Sunday School Journal" that it was possible to teach the same lesson with profit in the primary, intermediate and adult departments; but there were denominational jealousies; and there were prejudices in favor of particular systems. All these had to be overcome and a committee nominated in which all had confidence. The victory must have been very gratifying to Mr. Jacobs, for the Committee, although composed of representatives of many denominations has worked harmoniously and the system has won its way into favor by its own merits.

It is due to the Committee to say that during the whole twenty-three years the members have served without any remuneration. Their traveling expenses have been defrayed by certain publishers of Lesson Helps but the members have given their time and labor without fee or reward.

Since the inauguration of the system at the beginning of 1873 the schools under the guidance of the successive committees have completed three courses of the entire Bible. Lessons have been based on passages from thirty-four of the thirty-nine Old Testament books and from twenty-three of the twenty-seven books of the New Testament. Thus by the wise Providence of God, the Bible itself has been studied thoroughly and systematically in an age of rampant scepticism.

A SERAPHIC DIET.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage, preached last Sunday in the Academy of Music, N. Y. Text: Psalms 78: 25: "Man did eat angels' food."

SOMEWHAT risky would be the undertaking to tell just what was the manna that fell to the Israelites in the wilderness; of what it was made how it was made and who made it. The manna was called angels' food, but why so called? Was it because it came from the place where angels live; or because angels compounded it; or because angels did eat it; or because it was good enough for angels? On what crystal platter was it carried to the door of heaven, and then thrown out? How did it taste. We are told there was in it something like honey. but if the saccharine taste in it had been too strong, many would not have liked it, and so it may have had a commingling of flavors—this delicacy of the skies. It must have been nutritious, for a nation lived on it for forty years. It must have been healthful, for it is so inspiringly applauded. It must have been abundant, because it dismissed the necessity of a sutler for a great army. Each person had a ration of three quarts a day allowed to him, and so fifteen million pounds were necessary every week. Those were the times of which my text speaks, when "man did eat angels' food." If the good Lord. who has helped me so often, will help me now, I will first tell you what is angels' food. and then how we may get some of it for ourselves. In our mortal state we must have for mastication, and digestion. and assimilation, the products of the earth. Corporeity, as well as mentality. and spirituality, characterizes us. The style of diet has much to do with our well-being. Light and frothy food taken exclusively results in weak muscle and semi-invalidism. The taking of too much animal food produces sensuality. Vegetarians are cranks. Reasonable selection of the farinaceous and the solid ordinarily produces physical stamina.

But we have all occasionally been in an ecstatic state where we forgot the necessity of earthly food. We were fed by joys. by anticipations, by discoveries, by companionships that dwindled the dining hour into insignificance, and made the pleasures of the table stupid and uninviting. There have been cases where from seemingly invisible sources the human body has been maintained, as in the remarkable case of our invalid and Christian neighbor, Mollie Fancher, known throughout the medical and Christian world for that she was seven weeks without earthly food, fed and sustained on heavenly visions. Our beloved Doctor Irenaeus Prime, editor and theologian, recorded the wonders concerning this girl. Professor West, the great scientist, marvelled over it, and Willard Parker, of world-wide fame in surgery, threw up his hands in amazement at it. There are times in all our lives when the soul asserts itself, and says to the body,

"Hush! Stand back! Stand down! I am at a banquet where no chalices gleam, and no viands smoke, and no culinary implements clatter. I am feeding on that which no human hand has mixed, and no earthly oven baked. I am eating angels' food." If you have never been in such an exalted state, I commiserate your leaden temperament, and I dismiss you from this service as incompetent to understand the thrilling and glorious suggestiveness of my text when it says: "Man did eat angels' food."

Now, what do the supernaturals live on? They experience none of the demands of corporeity, and have no hindrance or environment in the shape of bone, and muscle, and flesh, and hence that which may delectate our palate, or invigorate our poor, dying frames would be of no use to them. But they have a food of their own. My text says so. There may be other courses of food in the heavenly menu that I am not aware of, but I know of five or six styles of food always on celestial tables when cherubim, and seraphim, and archangel gather for heavenly repast: the mystery of redemption; celestialized music; the heavenly picturesque; sublime colloquy; eternal enterprises; saintly association; Divine companionship; celebrative jubilance.

There is one subject that excites the curiosity and inquisitiveness of all those angels. St. Peter says, "Which thing the angels desire to look into:" That is, why did Christ exchange a palace for a barn? Why did he drop a sceptre from his right hand to take a spear into his left side? Why quit the anthem of the worshipping heavens to hear the crooning of a weary mother's voice? Was a straw better than a garland? "Could it not have been done in some other way?" says angel the first. "Was the human race worth such a sacrifice?" says angel the second. "How could heaven get along without him for thirty-three years?" says angel the third. "Through that assassination may sinful man rise into our eternal companionship!" says angel the fourth. And then they all bend toward each other and talk about it, and guess about it, and try to fathom it, and prophesy concerning it. But the subject is too big, and they only nibble at it. They only break off a piece of it. They only taste it. They just dip into it. And then one angel cries: "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain!" And another says, "Unsearchable!" And another says, "Past finding out!" And another says, "Alleluia!" And then they all fill their cups of gold with the "new wine of the kingdom.' Unlike the beakers of earth, which poison, these glow with immortal health, the wine pressed from the grapes of the heavenly Eshcol, and they all drink to the memory of manger and cross, shattered sepulchre and Olivetic ascension. Oh, that rapturous, inspiring, transporting theme of the world's ransom! That makes angels' food. The taking of that food gives stronger pulse to their gladness; adds several mornings of radiance to their foreheads; gives vaster circle to the sweep of their wings on mission inter-constellation. Some of the crumbs of that angels' food fall all around our wilderness camp to-day, and we feel like crying with Paul, "Oh, the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" or with expiring Stephen, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!" or with many an enraptured soul, "None but Christ! None but Christ!" Pass around this angels' food. Carry it through all these aisles. Climb with it through all these galleries. Take it among all the hovels, as well as among all the palaces of the great town. Give all nations a taste of this angels' food.

Now, in the emerald palace of heaven, let the cup-bearers and servants of the King remove this course from the banquet, and bring on another course of angel's food, which is Celestialized Music. You and I have seen at some concert or oratorio a whole assemblage to whom the music was a feast. Never anything that they took in at the lips of the mouth was so delightful to their taste as that which they took in at the lips of the ear. I have seen, and you have seen people actually intoxicated with sweet sounds. Oratorios which are always too protracted for those of us who have not had our faculties cultivated in that direction, were never long enough for them. As at eleven o'clock at night the leader of the orchestra gave the three taps of his baton to again start the music, they were as fresh and alert as when three hours before, and at eight o'clock, the curtain first lifted. Music to them is food for body, food for mind, and food for soul. From what I read in my Bible, I think celestialized music will make up a large part of angels' food. Why do I say "celestialized music?" Because though music may have been born in heaven, it had not all its charms until it came to earth and took a baptism of tears. Since then it has had a pathos and a tenderness that it could not otherwise have possessed. It had to pass under the shadows, and over stormy seas, and weep at sepulchres, and to be hummed as lullaby over the cradle of sick children, before it could mount to its present altitudes of heavenly power. No organ on earth would be complete without the stop, "Tremolo," and the stop, "Vox Humana." And no music of heaven would be complete without the "Tremolo" of earthly sorrow comforted, and the "Vox Humana" of earthly sympathies glorified. Just take up the New Testament and find it a note-book of celestialized music. It says Jesus sang a hymn before he went to the Mount of Olives, and if he could sing on earth with Bethlehem humiliation close behind him, and sworn enemies close on both sides of him, and the torments of Golgotha just before him, do you not suppose he sings in heaven? Paul and Silas sang in midnight dungeon, and do you not suppose that now they sing on the Delectable Summits? What do the harps, and trumpets, and choirs of Revelation suggest, if not music? What would the millions of good singers and players upon instruments who took part in earthly worship do in heaven without music? Why, the mansions ring with it. The great halls of eternity echo with it. The worship of unnumbered hosts is enwrapped with it. It will be the only art of earth that will have enough elasticity and strength to leap the grave and take possession of heaven. Sculpture will halt this side the grave, because it chiefly commemorates the forms of those who in heaven will be reconstructed, and what would we want of the sculptured imitation, when we stand in the presence of the resurrected original? Painting will halt this side the grave, because the colors of earth would be too tame for heaven, and what use to have pictured on canvas the scenes which shall be described to us by those who were the participants? One of the disciples will tell us about the "Last Supper" better than Titian, with mighty touch, set it up in art gallery. The plainest saint by tongue will describe the Last Judgment better than Michael Angelo. with his pencil, put it upon the ceiling of the Vatican. Architecture will halt this side the grave, for what use would there be for architect's compass and design in that city which is already built and garnished until nothing can be added; all the Tuilleries, and Windsor Castles, and St. Clouds of the earth piled up not equalling its humblest residences; all the St. Pauls, and St. Peters, and St. Izaaks, and St. Sophias of the earth built into one cathedral not equalling the Heavenly Temple. But Music will pass right on, right up, and right in, and millions in heaven will acknowledge that, under God, she was the chief cause of their salvation. Oh, I would like to be present when all the great Christian singers and the great Christian players of all the ages shall congregate in heaven. Of course, they must, like all the rest of us, be cleansed and ransomed by the blood of the slain Lamb. Alas! that some of the great artists of sweet sound have been as distinguished for profligacy as for the way they warbled the song, or fingered the key-board, or trod the organ pedal. Some who have been distinguished bassos, and sopranos. and prima donnas on earth, I fear will never sing the song of Moses and the Lamb, or put the lip to the trumpet with sounds of victory before the throne. But many of the masters who charmed us on earth will more mightily charm us in heaven. Great Music Hall of Eternity! May you and I be there some day to acclaim when the "Hallelujah Chorus" is wakened. As on earth there have been harmonies made up of other harmonies, a strain of music from this cantata, and a strain of music from that overture, and a bar from this, and a bar from that, but one great tune, or theme, into which all the others were poured as rivers into a sea, so it may be given to the mightiest soul in the heavenly world to gather something from all the sacred songs we have sung on earth, or which have been sung in all the ages, and roll them on in eternal symphony: but the one great theme, and the one overmastering tone that shall carry all before it, and uplift all heaven from central throne to furthest gate of pearl, and to highest capstone of amethyst, will be. "Unto him who loved us, and washed us from our sins, in his own blood, and made us kings and priests unto God, and the Lamb: to him be glory!" That will be manna enough for all heaven to feed on. That will be a banquet for immortals. That will be angels' food.

Now, in the emerald palace of heaven, let the cup-bearers and servants of the King remove this course from the banquet, and bring on another course of angels' food, which is. Laying Out of Mighty Enterprise. The Bible lets us know positively that the angels have our world's affairs on their heart. They afford the rapid transit from world to world. Ministering spirits, escorting spirits, defending spirits, guardian spirits. Yea, they have all worlds on their thought. We are told they sang together at the Creation, and that implied not only the creation of our world, but of other worlds. Shall they plan only for our little planet, and be unconcerned for a planet three hundred times larger? No. They have all the galaxies under their observation: mighty schemes of helpfulness to be laid out and executed: shipwrecked worlds to be towed in: planetary fires to be put out: demoniac hosts riding up to be hurled back and down. These angels of light unhorse an Apollyon with one stroke of battle-axe celestial. They talk these matters all over. They bend toward each other in sublimest colloquy. They have cabinet meetings of winged immortals. They assemble the mightiest of them in holy consultation. They plan out stellar, lunar solar, constellated achievement. They vie with each other as to who shall do the grandest thing for the eternities. They compose doxologies for the Temple of the Sun They preside over coronations. If in the great organ of the universe one key gets out of tune, they plan for its re-tuning No undertaking is so difficult; no post o duty is so distant; no mission is so stupendous, but at God's command they are gladly obedient. When they sit together in the heavenly places, Gabriel, and Michael, the archangel; and the angel that pointed Hagar to the fountain in the desert; and the angel that swung open the prison door o delivered Peter; and the angels who are t be the reapers at the end of the world; and the angel that stood by Paul to encourag him on the foundering corn-ship of Alexandria; and the two angels that sentinele the tomb of Christ; and the four angel that St. John saw in Apocalypse at the four corners of the earth; and the twelv angels that guard the twelve swingin pearls; and the twenty thousand chariote angels that the Psalmist described; and more radiant than all of them put together, and mightier than all, and lovelier than all, "The Angel of the Covenant;" the cadences of his voice, the best music that ever entranced mortal or immortal ears; his smile another noon risen on mid-noon; his presence enough to make a heaven if there were no other attraction—I say, when they meet together in the council chambers close to the Throne—Ah! that will be realement infinite. That will be a repast supernal. That will be angels' food. And one of my exciting anticipations of heaven is the prospect of seeing and talking with some of them. Why not? What did they come out for on the balcony on that Christmas night and sing for our world, if they did not want to be put in communication with us? I know the serenade was in Greek, but they knew that their words would be translated in all languages. If they thought themselves too good to have anything to do with us, would they have dropped Christmas carols upon the shepherds some of them as bad as any of us have ever been? Aye! If they sang for mortals, will they not sing for us when we become immortals?

Now, in the emerald palace of heaven, let the cup-bearers and servants of the King remove this course from the banquet, and bring on another course of angel's food—the last course, and the best; the dessert; the culmination of the feast, which is, Celebrative Jubilance. You and I have known people who prided themselves on never getting excited. They have cultivated the phlegmatic. You never saw them cry; you never heard them in a burst of laughter. They are monotonous, and to me intolerable. I am afraid of a man or a woman that cannot cry; I am afraid of a man or a woman who cannot laugh. Christ says in the book of Revelation that such people are to him nauseating, and cause regurgitation. (Revelation 3: 16.) "Because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth." But the angels in heaven have no stolidity or unresponsiveness. There is one thing that agitates them into holy mirth. When that happens if their harp be hung up they take it down, and with deft fingers pull from among the strings a canticle. They run in to their neighbors on the same golden street and tell the good news. If Miriam has there cymbals anything like those with which she performed on the banks of the Red Sea, she claps them in triumph, and there is a festal table spread, and the best of the angels' food is set on it. When is it? It is when a man or woman down in the world who was all wrong, by the grace of God is made all right. (Luke 15: 10.) "There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." Why are they so happily agitated? Because they know what a tremendous thing it is to turn clear around from the wrong road, and take the right road. It is because they know the difference between swine's trough with nothing but husks, and a King's banquet with angels' food. It is because they know the infinite, the everlasting difference between down, and up. And then, their festivity is catching. If we hear the bells of a city ring, we say, "What is that for?" If we hear rolling out from an auditorium the sound of a full orchestra, we say, "What is happening here?" And when the angels of God take on jubilance over a case of earthly repentance, your friends in heaven will say, "What new thing has happened? Why full diapason? Why the chime from the oldest towers of eternity?" The fact is, my hearers, there are people in heaven who would like to hear from you. Your children there are wondering when father and mother will come into the Kingdom, and with more glee than they ever danced in the hallway at your coming home at eventide, they will dance the floor of the heavenly mansion at the tidings of father and mother saved. Beside that, the old folks want to hear from you. They are standing at the head of the celestial stairs waiting for the news that their prayers have been answered, and that you are coming on to take from their lips a kiss better than that which now they throw you. Calling you by your first name, as they always did, they are talking about you and saying: "There is our son," or, "There is our daughter down in that world of struggle, battling, suffering, sinning, weeping. Why can they not see that Christ is the only one who can help, and comfort, and save?"

That is what they are saying about you. And if you will this hour in one prayer of surrender that will not take more than a second to make, decide this, then, swifter than telegraphic dispatch the news would reach them, and angels of God who never fell would join your glorified kindred in celebration, and the caterers of heaven would do their best, and saints and seraphs side by side would take angels' food. Glory be to God for such a possibility! Oh, that this moment there might be a rush for heaven!

The Spirit and the bride say, Come,
Rejoicing saints re-echo. Come;
Who faints, who thirsts, who will, may come;
Thy Saviour bids thee come.

A NOBLE SHOEMAKER.

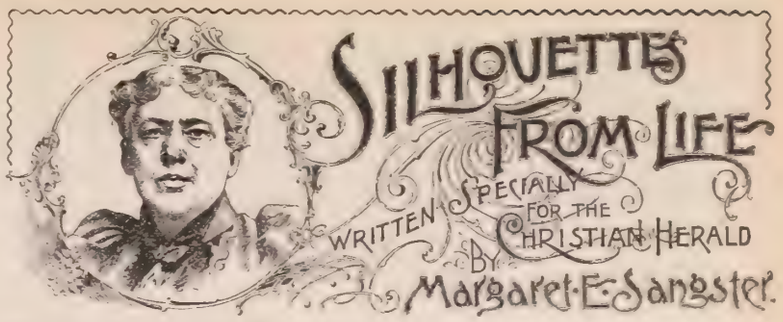
During the Russian famine, the Swedish people, like the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, contributed funds for the relief of the starving people. They were contributed by Herr J. Stadling, a Swedish gentleman who went to Russia for that purpose. During his stay he made the acquaintance of Count Tolstoi, and has published a description of him from which we learn the following facts: "Tolstoi," says Herr Stadling, "is a Russian nobleman, having a large estate at Yasnaja Poljana, in the province of Tula. I suppose this estate would be of the value of 300,000 roubles [$127,500]. It is his ancestral estate, but he has others at Samara. He belongs to one of the oldest families in Russia. He succeeded to the estate in his seventeenth year, when he was at the university of Kasan. He had by this time imbibed ideas which were regarded as highly eccentric. He adopted the Sermon on the Mount as the rule of his life. He carried his ideas into practice by handing over part of his estates to the peasants living upon them, and he would have followed the same course at Yasnaja Poljana, had not the Countess interfered and appealed to the authorities, who took charge of them in trust for his family. During the famine Count Tolstoi and his family and their helpers succeeded in establishing about 400 eating rooms, besides several depots at which 40,000 persons were fed daily. Tolstoi is simple and unaffected in his manners. He lives in the plainest style it is possible to imagine. A wooden chair, a small camp bed, and such-like simple furniture are the only things he uses. He is a stern and strict vegetarian and abstainer. He dresses habitually in the garb of a Russian peasant. In order to carry out his ideas as to the dignity of labor, he has learnt shoemaking, and devotes as much time daily to this pursuit as circumstances will allow. His influence has been felt even by the Nihilists who are violently opposed to his doctrine of non-resistance, but large numbers of them have been won over by his books. In fact, he is to-day the greatest moral force in Russia, and the secret of that force is his burning indignation against all that is immoral or unjust. His whole life is a protest against the immorality of the present day. He holds up the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount as forming a basis for an ideal life, and he holds that true religious life can only be lived by carrying out its teachings. He believes that the Kingdom of God will never come on earth until this is done by every man and woman." Herr Stadling adds that Tolstoi is one of the finest scholars in Russia.

THE SOUL'S INVOCATION.

COME, gentle Spirit! like a dove
Descend upon us from above;
In our hour of gloom and sadness,
Warm with love and bring us gladness
As thou didst with tongue of fire,
Come, oh, come, and lift us higher!

Gentle Spirit we do pray
Light upon us day by day.
In the moments, as they fly,
Gentle Spirit, pass not by.
Let us hear thy precious Voice,
Let us every day rejoice.

Come upon us now and rest,
That our souls may thus be blest.
Holy Spirit, be our friend;
Guard and guide us to the end.—W.A.K.



THE BARRELS FROM RENFIELD.

"THE last of the sugar, Father!"

"And the last of the oatmeal?"

"Only flour enough for one more baking! Hardly that."

"The potatoes are almost gone, and there's no more pork."

"Lottchen's shoes are completely worn out. She cannot go out of the house until she gets another pair! Neither to school, nor to play, nor anywhere else."

They sat around the breakfast table, a fine group, the brave home missionary and his family, and the usual blessing on the food had been pronounced, the sweet devout blessing without which John Fletcher never began a meal. "Father!" he had said reverently, "thou openest thine hand and satisfiest the desire of every living thing; grant us," he had continued, "thy blessing on our many mercies, forgiveness of our sins, and grace for the day. Accept us for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen!"

"Amen!" repeated the rest.

Mrs. Fletcher, a thin, fragile and pale-faced woman with a sweet, yet anxious look, was pouring hot coffee from a steaming tin pot. It was she who had sparingly apportioned the last of the sugar to each cup, and called her husband's attention to the empty bowl.

Greta, the eldest daughter, had spoken of the oatmeal, as she helped to the porridge. Katrina had supplemented the statements of her mother and sister by her allusion to the flour, she being the family bread-maker, and it was John Jr., the only son, who had mentioned the potatoes and the pork. The family all took a hand in the work.

During this time, Mr. Fletcher did not speak. By so much as the quiver of a muscle he did not show that the situation alarmed him, or that it tried his faith. But, in his old leathern pocketbook there were at that moment precisely forty-seven cents.

It was a cold morning and a bitter blast at that moment went whirling round the house, rattling the shutters, and moaning down the chimney like the muttering of a wild beast.

"Put more wood in the stove, Jack," said the minister, tranquilly. "Thank God that we have plenty of wood."

"But, father, dear," urged the daughter, "where is our food to come from, and what shall we do for clothes? We can't eat fuel. And everything going at once."

"Darling," and the minister's tone was as solemn and sweet as when it pronounced the benediction, "I don't know. God knows. And we must not worry; we must be in perfect peace. Has he not said, 'Fear not little flock. It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.' Relief will come, and rations, if we obey orders."

The family settled itself to its several occupations, as if it had been that of a millionaire. All in the one living room, which was study, parlor, kitchen, nursery, and Jack's bedroom in combination. The frontier parsonage was not very spacious.

Mr. Fletcher was busy over his Sunday's sermon. Greta was putting a seat into Jack's trousers, his best ones; Katrina was knitting a stocking. John was preparing a Latin lesson for his mother, who among her many duties, included that of fitting her boy for college. She herself had been an honor graduate of an Eastern college, and notwithstanding the bareness of her present lot, the traditions of refinement remained unimpaired in her home economy. Lottchen played with her doll, contented with old shoes, or none, so long as mother and father were there.

As a family they were in great straits, in common with the whole neighborhood. Men came miles to church without overcoats in freezing weather. Women had no flannels nor other comfortable underclothing, and were in want of gowns and jackets. As did our Pilgrim forefathers, they did, suffering penury, want, hardship of every kind, and in stoical fortitude. The drought had killed the last crops. There was no money in the place.

For Mr. Fletcher to feel no anxiety at the well-nigh desperate state of affairs, would have been impossible, but his motto was, "Commit thy way unto the Lord, and he shall direct thy steps," and on this motto he acted. He had written three weeks ago to friends in the East: the answer had come telling of help soon to be sent. He lived in constant and earnest communion with God, the state of heart in which every moment is an inaudible prayer.

The Renfield Church, in the hill country of Connecticut, was composed of well-to-do people, farmers and tradesmen, and professional men with comfortable incomes. Not a soul in Renfield had even a bowing acquaintance with poverty. Everybody had enough and to spare. It was to Renfield that John Fletcher's friend had sent John Fletcher's plain, manly letter, and it had been read one evening after the prayer meeting.

Result: The ladies of the church met and packed four big barrels for the distant frontier church, the church of Lonesome Valley, Rev. John Fletcher, pastor. They had taken the deeper interest in it, when the President of the Ladies' Society stated that her old schoolmate Annie Wagner, had married Mr. Fletcher, and had bravely borne the many trials of a home missionary's life for seventeen years.

What went into the barrels? Well, in the first place, a goodly supply of warm, well-mended clothing, not in the latest style, but thoroughly good. Judge Stuart's thick blue cape overcoat, that he had kept this five years for occasional use in sleighrides, his daughter's heavy brown ulster; Mrs. Merrifield's second-best fur-lined cloak and a great deal more; dresses, trowsers, capes, petticoats, stockings, shoes, shawls, arctics, leggings: just a lot of nice things, the superfluities of a well-clothed community. Blankets went into one barrel, and quilts, one old lady sent five patch-work ones, well wadded and really splendid, rising sun and evening star patterns. Then there was a goodly supply of groceries, and, tucked into the very middle of one barrel, a volume of sermons just published, done up in three wrappers and addressed in a bold hand to Mr. Fletcher with "Personal" in one corner."

In more than one aspect this was a gift to be prized, for here and there between the leaves, the thoughtful donor had inserted greenbacks to the amount of one hundred dollars, and said nothing about it, being not one to sound a trumpet before him.

A loud knock at the door interrupted the parsonage tasks, in the middle of the morning, just when Mrs. Fletcher was wondering how they could dine with neither pork nor potatoes.

"Hello!" cried a teamster. "Here's a consignment for you, Pastor! Four big barrels from Renfield, Conn."

Great was the excitement and joy in the Lonesome Valley Church. Something for everybody was in those blessed barrels. Shoes for Lottchen and for others like her.

Provisions for many an empty larder, and the minister's family sat down that noon to such coffee and such sugar as they had not tasted in months.

The little company of friends of the Lonesome Valley Church, when the gifts had been distributed, sang with exultant voices, from grateful hearts, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," and when next Mr. Fletcher prayed in his family, he took up a sort of "Glory, hallelujah" strain, ending with a thrill in his low tones, and a throb in his soul, that sent tears to his wife's eyes, "Never will we disbelieve or doubt thee again, oh! God of our salvation. Thou art the strength of our life and our portion forever."

PURITY OF LIFE.

S. S. Lesson for March 24. Rom. 13: 8-14. Golden Text I Thes. 5:21. By Mrs. Baxter.

ONLY once has an absolutely pure life been lived on earth by a Man amongst men, and that life is the Light of men. (John 1: 4). The standards of purity among men, inside and outside of the Church of God, are almost as many as the individuals who uphold them. There is but one company of God's children who have absolutely the same standard, for they have absolutely the same hope: that of the Lord's return. "Beloved," writes the apostle John—the chosen recipient of the last Revelation of his Lord to the Church—"now are we children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him, for we shall see him even as he is." And then he adds: "And every one that hath this hope on him, [A.V. in him], even as he is pure" (I John 3: 2 4 R V). Absolute purity of life is nothing less than to be pure even as he is pure. A lower standard is human; this is divine. But it is the hope of Christ's coming in him, penetrating his whole being, possessing him, making part and parcel of all his life, his plans, his projects, his thoughts, his conversation, which impels a man to purify himself even as he is pure. One who has this hope in him has a motive actuating him which tries all things in the balances of the sanctuary. He can no longer look upon purity as simply the abstinence from grosser forms of sin, from drunkenness, gluttony, impurity or other fleshly sins, nor even from temper, jealousy, envy, strife or other heart sins. Pure "even as he is pure" goes far deeper; it means that all the secret springs where the motives are formed, must be cleansed from self, and must proceed from constant and immediate contact with the living God. Jesus was in heaven while he was still on earth. All that he did on earth was the outcome of a life lived in closest oneness with his Father. He could say to the Jews: "Many good works have I shewed you from the Father:" and again, "the words which I say unto you, I speak not of myself but the Father which dwelleth in me, he doeth the works." (John 14: 10).

"God is love." The passage chosen for our lesson commences with the words: "Owe no man anything but to love one another." True purity is to be pure from self as Christ is; true sanctification is love even as he loved us. We are only holy, only sanctified, only pure, in the measure that we love, and "by love serve one another." (Gal. 5:13). Love is a debt we owe, every saved sinner owes this debt, it never has been, and never can be worked off. Infinite, inexplicable Love came down to us when we were at enmity with him. It is that we should love others as he has loved us. All holiness which does not result in love is a holiness which cannot produce life. The first man was made a living soul and the last man was made a life-giving spirit. When the Son of man met the lost woman of Samaria at the well of Sychar, and, instead of being repelled by her rudeness, he patiently set himself to win her, he imparted his own life to her, as he led her to believe on him, after searching her heart in the faithfulness of love, by bringing before her the sin of her life, or as she expressed it, "he told me all things that ever I did." Thus the Son observed and prepared to know him as the Christ. Had he noticed for a moment her personal rudeness to himself, [illegible] instead of explaining to her when she took upon herself to speak of the theological opinions of the Jews and the Samaritans, he might indeed have wounded her and conquered her in argument, but he would have left her an unsaved soul. He came that we might have life, and life flowed forth from him into the souls and bodies of those who listened to him, as well as those who touched him. We owe it to him, and we owe it to the lost world for which he died, that we too should be sources of life, rivers of living water to those with whom we come in contact. But this can only be in the measure in which we love "with a pure heart fervently." (1 Pet. 1: 22). How many eloquent preachers there are who yet leave their congregation where they find them, and work "no deliverance in the earth," whereas some poor illiterate man or woman whom God has filled with love, one who has no reputation to watch over but who yields himself as a simple instrument to God, is being used to the salvation of many. It is love which does it. The great preacher may be absorbed with his own powers, the simple, unknown follower of Christ sees only his grace and the needs of the unsaved. While an Eli could do nothing, a little Samuel could bring a people near to God.

"Owe no man anything but to love one another." Paul was free from all men, but by love made himself servant to all, that he might win the more. (1. Cor. 9: 19.) Paul owed no debts; no unfulfilled obligations brought in an atmosphere between him and others which chilled his love; he had no unconfessed feelings of bitterness or wounded spirit which hindered the flow of divine love he owed no man anything but a little more love. In this he could never estimate his debt as fully paid, to him who had loved him and given himself for him. Paul exercised himself to have always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man. Thus he was free, untrammelled. Like his Master, he fulfilled the law, for "He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law." In the original, the definite article is used—not any other. Every man can love some other, but the other is the man or woman who tries him most, the one, the very tone of whose voice, the very expression of whose face, the very movements of whom are used by Satan to stir up in his heart enmity, dislike, contempt or irritability; the very one whom God is using more specially than any other to test and to educate him. If "the other" so repugnant to our nature is loved, not merely tolerated, but loved as Christ has loved us, then the law is fulfilled. Only divine love can love the instruments by whom we suffer, by whom all the flesh in us is brought to the surface. But divine love embraces just that other with an intensity of love which nothing can chill, for it is a love eternal as God's; it is part of his very own, and such love is purity of life even as he is pure—such love leaves the law powerless to make a claim; it is the love which "worketh no ill to his neighbor," even by thought, and therefore is "the fulfilling of the law."

And the solemnity of the time, more solemn now than ever, lays a stress upon our obligation to love. "And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed." True it is eighteen hundred years and more since these words were written, and it would seem as though they had lost their force by reason of the lapse of time, but our God is not bound by time as we are. With him a thousand years is as one day and one day as a thousand years. The creation is waiting and God is waiting, "for the manifestation of the sons of God." Rom. 8: 19. The world will not, and cannot believe that God has sent his Son until those whom the Father has given to him are "perfected into one." (John 17: 23, R.V.) The perfecting of his elect is God's measure of time. The power is his, and no delay on his part has hindered these years. But now that the signs of our Lord's coming are multiplying, that the eyes of the world are upon the Jews and Palestine, we know that the times of the Gentiles draw to an end. Now that everywhere earnest Christians are becoming more and more alive to the nearness of the Lord's coming, these words of Paul to the Romans come back to us with a new power: "Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. This is not salvation from our past sins, but that "hope of salvation" which Paul taught the Thessalonians, whose conversion had been such a thorough one.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

NOT IN RIOTING OR DRUNKENNESS.

HERE seems, on the surface, to be a lack of affinity between the remedy and the disease in pointing a victim of vice to love, as a means of deliverance from his impurity. Experience has proved, however, that there is efficacy in the method. A boy's love for his mother has often been a shield to him against temptation; and a dissipated, hardened, criminal who has been deaf to all appeals, has often broken down when some one has reminded him of his mother's love. There have been cases, too, where a young man has been turned away from a career of vice by the love of some pure woman. Love is a potent force in the heart and, if it can be enlisted on the side of righteousness, it can work wonders. Paul places his chief reliance upon it in the passage selected for the lesson. He says it is better than law, because if a man loves God he will serve him, and if he loves a man he will not injure him in any way. There is no need to tell a man who loves another that he must not kill him or rob him. He has no inclination to do either; so love is the fulfilling of the law. Now, how can love operate to keep anyone from becoming impure, or to rescue him after he has become impure? In explaining this, the teacher has an opportunity to plant in the child's mind a conception which may be an inestimable help to him all through his life. It is that of God near him, ready to work with him for the transformation of his life. He has two natures, and God wants him to rise out of the control of his lower nature and to lead a spiritual life. God will help him to do that. He urges him to stop seeking his pleasures in eating and drinking and other pleasures of the flesh. There must be a struggle in a man between the animal and the spiritual, which can end only in the man rising to the spiritual or falling back to the animal. If he will try to rise, God will help him. Thus he invites love and confidence. And he does so by giving his own love, so freely and lavishly. He is love, and we have no better idea of Christ than love incarnate. To realize that God loves him, and to love God and holiness, is the one sure way out of impurity.

High time to awake out of sleep. There are some creatures who sleep all the winter. In the hybernating condition all the vital functions are reduced to an extremely low activity. Life is practically suspended. Respiration is so slight that if the hybernating animal is placed in an atmosphere of carbonic acid gas, that would be certain death to it in its normal condition it will remain in it unhurt for hours. The functions it is endowed with are idle, and the creature is useless. But when the Spring comes it begins to stir itself and make use of its powers. The Apostle intimates that idle and useless people are in this state of hybernation, and calls upon them to arouse themselves from their half dead condition.

Cast off the works of darkness. It is often very difficult to do this, for when one who has indulged in evil would shake himself free and lead a good life he finds himself thwarted and entrapped, either by the power of his own habits or by the connections he has formed. Vice in any form, whether drinking, gambling, lust or any other form is a dangerous thing to meddle with. It is like the plant known as the glaucous birthwort. The fly or moth that enters the tubular flower finds its passage easy, and having feasted to the full, turns to fly away. But the inside of the flower is lined with sharp spines, whose points are turned inward. They offer no hindrance to the moth on entering but when he attempts to leave they are pointed toward him and he is pierced from above and below. Once inside, there is no escape.

Not in rioting or drunkenness. Dr. Newman Hall utters an earnest warning against the indulgence in strong drink. He says that the parents of a beautiful girl who was a member of his Bible Class, came to him in great distress. Their daughter was missing and they could not find her. The hospitals were searched, the asylums were visited, the rivers dragged, but there was no trace of the girl. They sadly concluded that she must have been murdered and her body concealed. Nearly a year afterward she was found. She was not dead, but she was dead to beauty and to virtue. Her story was a terrible one. On leaving the Bible class she had gone for a walk with a girl friend who had introduced her to a gentleman whom they met. On his invitation, after repeated refusals, she drank a glass of wine. She was unused to the stimulant, but finding that it raised her spirits, she drank more and had what her girl friend called a good time. She became dazed and finally lost consciousness. When she recovered her senses she was in a vicious resort and her character was ruined. She was ashamed to go home and stayed in the house of sin, becoming as vicious and degraded as the other inmates. She was found by a city missionary who restored her to her home. But sorrow and shame had done their work on her delicate frame, and in less than a year she was dead. The first glass of wine had borne its fatal fruit.

Not in strife. The religion of Christ is one of peace and love. Members of his church ought to be examples in both characteristics. Quarrelsome people are a nuisance in the church and anywhere else and it it is a significant fact that they are a nuisance and an injuty to themselves as well as others. A quarrelsome person is sure to be miserable. Sea-crabs are natural types of the quarrelsome people. When left free, they seize on each other's limbs and tear them off. If a crab is irritated and one of its own small claws be inserted in the grip of one of its large claws, it is unable to recognize its own limb, and exerting all its strength, will crush the claw thereby injuring itself.

Make not provision for the flesh. The reading of this verse was the turning-point in the career of the great Augustine. He tells us, in his confessions, that in 368, at the crisis of his life, when after an illness, he was torn with the conflict of emotions, his vicious past life beckoning him to resume his indulgences, and his better nature protesting, he flung himself on the ground under a fig tree in a retired part of his garden at Milan, to decide his future. He was thirty-two years old, handsome, brilliant, high-spirited. As he turned the matter over in his mind, he heard a voice saying, "Take and read." It seemed to come from a neighboring house, but Augustine accepted it as a voice from heaven. A roll of Paul's epistles which he had left with a friend was in his mind at the time, and he concluded that the words referred to it. He went to his friend's house and asked for the roll. Opening it at random his eyes fell on this passage: "Make not provison for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof." It seemed a divine command; he obeyed. Going to his mother, the saintly Monica, whose heart had been well nigh broken by her beloved son's degradation, he told her of his resolve to live for God henceforth. From this resolve he never swerved, and like the Apostle Paul, whom in many ways he resembled, his whole subsequent life was one of service and sacrifice.

Thousands Bless the Fund.

has brought "Winter Sunshine" into the Stricken West—The Relief Work still Progressing—Splendid Donations of Seed and More to Follow.

ANOTHER striking illustration of the divine truth that God takes care of all of his children who place their trust in him, has been furnished during the past week, in connection with the Western Relief Fund. At a time when the seed question has become a burning one the afflicted States and when the Western farmers, though supplied with clothing and food sufficient for present needs, are most despairing of being able to do any sowing this year, their prayers are being answered in a most unexpected manner. The Chicago Board of Trade has appointed a committee to raise a Seed Fund. Wm. T. Baker, Esq., President of the Board, sends us this telegram, explaining the action of the Board:

CHICAGO, March 2, 1895.

LOUIS KLOPSCH, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York: The action of the Board is the appointment of a Committee to devise ways and means for the relief of needy and worthy farmers residing in the drought-stricken sections of the West. The relief will be given in the form of seed-grain and will be distributed upon a business basis. The extent of the relief will depend upon the amount subscribed. A Committee on Subscriptions is at work and will report in a few days. We cannot supply the tithe of what is said to be required for seed and feed. Subscriptions will come from individual members of the Board. As an organization, we have no authority under the laws to make appropriations for such purposes.

WM. T. BAKER, President.

The New York and St. Louis Boards will also probably give donations.

Several leading seedsmen have sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offers of vegetable seed in such generous quantities as will gladden the hearts of very many families. The following letter from a leading seed-house, shows the spirit of Christian sympathy which has prompted these timely gifts to the West:

Office of JAMES J. H. GREGORY & SONS, Seed Growers and Wholesale and Retail Dealers in Garden and Flower Seed.

MARBLEHEAD, MASS.

To the Editor of The Christian Herald:

MY DEAR SIR: There is no way in which the unfortunate farmers of the drouth-stricken region of Nebraska, Southern Dakota, and Kansas can be so effectually helped as through a supply of seed to enable them to plant their gardens, for the product from these will help them materially in the way of food until their standard crops mature. Any money value given this way they can increase many times over. Now there is no good reason why these suffering pioneers, with their wives and little ones, should not be able to sit down to tables loaded with good vegetables the coming summer. A drouth will not follow three seasons in succession; it would be contrary to all precedent. It is practically merely a question whether they shall have given them a supply of garden seed.

To set the ball a-rolling I will give vegetable seed to one thousand families, sufficient for each to plant about one-fifth of an acre. The lot will embrace a dozen varieties of the standard vegetables, including beans, peas and sweet corn, and, as a rule, each will be among the earliest of its kind. That this may be put on a business basis, I would have applicants meet, organize, elect executive officers, these to be endorsed by the clergymen of the locality, and further, the addresses of all who are aided be forwarded with the application, which will prevent the various organizations overlapping each other, or duplicates sent to the same applicant, for I am continually in receipt of individual applications from the stricken section. Free carriage is open to Nebraska, through the generous action of the express companies, and half rates given to Colorado and Kansas.

The expressage on such long routes is of course high, even at half-rates, and this makes it necessary to send to individuals by mail; now this, added to the value of the seed and the cost of putting up and packing, makes a heavy burden for one pair of shoulders to bear: cannot some blessed with the means, bless themselves by giving help here—such help to be acknowledged in the HERALD? Lists of those to whom the seed is sent will always be accessible at my seed house. However, whether the public decide to help me or not, one thousand families shall have a supply of good garden seed—I have done the thing alone before and will do it again if necessary; it is more than one man's share, but there is greater misery in the refusing than in the doing of it. I have already responded to two hundred applications.

Yours truly,

Marblehead, Mass. J. J. H. GREGORY.

The suggestion in the letter of Mr. Gregory as to the organization of Distributing Committees is an excellent one and should be followed in every county, in order that the seed may be sent where it will be most serviceable. It is hoped that other seedsmen in different parts of the country may speedily add their contributions, so that the benefit may be shared by as large a number of families as possible. All contributions of vegetable or other seed for this purpose will be acknowledged in these columns, the seed to be sent direct to the persons selected by the local committees as proper beneficiaries. No applications will be received unless endorsed by a regularly organized committee.

W. Atlee Burpee & Co., of Philadelphia, the well-known seedsmen, telegraph us that they will duplicate their previous donation of $100 worth of seed to the Western sufferers. Theodore Outerbridge of Sunnylands, Bermuda, has sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, per steamship "Trinidad," two boxes of vegetable seeds for the same purpose, "thinking they may be as acceptable as anything I could send," Mr. Outerbridge adds in his letter.

Relief work is still being pushed vigorously in all the afflicted sections of the West. Manager Ludden's latest weekly report to the Nebraska Senate shows that very few donations of supplies are now coming in apart from those that are secured through the solicitation of representatives who have sent out to other States by the various County Relief Committees. Mr. Ludden writes us:

We are sending into every county, I think, and concerning those reported in destitution, we have written to the county officers and asked them to report.

I thought it would be pleasing to your readers to know what we had done with the money you so generously turned over to us. Of the $5,000, $2,700 was put in fuel just before that severe blizzard swept over our State, and part of the balance was put in flour. We have a little of that fund left yet.

Of the Tea and Coffee Fund for aged and invalid sufferers, over one half as our reports show, has been expended for tea and coffee. We have not needed to buy sugar, having enough left of our Louisiana train to care for the needy. With every package of tea or coffee we had a card enclosed, showing that it was from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund. Now, if your readers will just look at it a moment, they will see a number of blessings that come to our needy people from these donations. About 3,600 families received coal from the money already expended. Over 2,500 families have received tea and coffee. Of course we have not had that number sick; but we have a great many that are aged and to whom a cup of tea proves a great blessing. We are still holding a small part of the Tea Fund, because, as Spring advances, I know the demand will be very great for this particular kind of supplies, and our State funds will hardly allow us to procure such necessities.

At the eighteenth annual encampment Department of the Grand Army of the Republic of Nebraska, held at Hastings recently, this resolution offered by Department Commander Gen. Church Howe, was unanimously adopted:

To Mr. Louis Klopsch, Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of New York City, and the benevolent readers and patrons of that excellent journal, we are greatly indebted for the munificent donation of One Thousand Dollars. This splendid contribution relieved much destitution and put a little "winter sunshine" into the homes of many of the survivors of the war living on their western homesteads. Such acts of Christian charity will never be forgotten by the comrades of this Department.

One of the brightest episodes of the Kansas relief work was the distribution of the last car-load of supplies and clothing sent to that State from our Central Supply Depot in New York. This gift, from our readers, like its predecessors, gladdened many desolate hearts and brought warmth and comfort to those who were shivering in the cold and storm. The needy in Quinter and for many miles around gathered at the distribution and the scene shortly after the arrival of the car (whose unloading our artist has depicted), was one that would alone have repaid the contributors for their efforts, could they have witnessed it and listened to the fervent gratitude of those whom they were instrumental in helping.

From South Dakota, which is still receiving help from the Relief Fund, appeals continue to come. These, however, will be relieved through our Distributors to whom they are promptly referred. Byron Herrick writes from Drakola:

We must have clothing and provisions here or many will freeze or starve. A number of families are destitute.

Oklahoma still sends its quota of appeals and the stories the letters tell of suffering and privation are pathetic enough to move any heart. Newkirk has many destitute, in need of almost everything. Rev. John Mordy, Pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Newkirk, writes:

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been the means of bringing relief to thousands of suffering people in many parts of the world, and therefore, I trust that you will allow me to make a brief statement of the Strip country in the O. T. To-day a convention of farmers of Kay County met in Newkirk to confer in regard to securing seed, oats, corn and potatoes. They agreed to make a public appeal to the older and more prosperous parts of our land, for a loan. Will not some of your readers enable us to save our independence as well as our lives? We could tell of old people reduced to one meal per day and so thinly clothed that one wonders how they ever lived through the cold weather, but our best people will suffer almost death before asking charity. Any persons who can aid us will please correspond with Rev. John Mordy, Newkirk, Okla.

Thanks are due to our Volunteer Distributors for their prompt reports of relief work performed. Money contributions to the Fund are acknowledged on this page, and clothing, &c., on page 169.

A SEASON OF MODERATION.

DO not allow the Winter and Spring to leave you at the mouth of the Summer furnace ready to be consumed by the first epidemic that confronts you. This is the season when all sensible people see the advantage that must come from a moderation of worldliness. It is a wonder to me that in these cities the people can physically endure the exorbitant demands of social life Winter after Winter. Blessed any church that shall declare a cessation. Good for the body, good for the mind, good for the soul is such an interregnum.

Without any divine authority we have dropped from nearly all our churches the divinely enjoined duty of fasting. I can remember but five or six days of fasting. One on account of locusts, one on account of a drought, one on account of the war, two on account of assassinated presidents. The fact is that fasting damages the good nature of most people, and we enjoy family prayers after breakfast more than before. But the probability is that we do not go at fasting in a right way. If with full appreciation of our need and the wants of the world we went into fasting and prayer, we would get unwonted blessing. Moses fasted, Abraham fasted, Jacob fasted, Joshua fasted, David fasted, Elijah fasted, Christ fasted. God honored fasting in ages gone by, and he will honor it now if we undertake it with the same earnestness and faith and prayer. The fact is that society will never be clarified and the world never redeemed until there be more strong crying and tears. We will never get our shoulders under the world's burdens until we get down on our knees. The church, according to Paul's potent figure of speech, must travail in birth, because of great anxiety in behalf of the world's salvation. Religion must cease being a plaything and become a matter of absorbing struggle—struggle of hard work, a struggle of importunity. We are here to help hasten the world's emancipation. May all our services, all our talents, all our estate, all our time, all our eternity, and all our self-denials be Christ's.

HOW TO MAKE WORK EASY.

THE same amount of Christian work is exhilarating to one man and exhausting to another. In the one case it is a tonic and the other leeches. Why the difference?

In order to work easy the undertaking must be congenial. But you say that much of what is expected of us is repulsive to the natural soul. Our reply is, "get your heart right and the work will be pleasant. No need of your trying to do Christian work unless you are a Christian."

Do not [illegible] reports. All Christendom is engaged in the redemption of one man would make a failure. God only is sufficient. Our work is to bring the soul under the proper influences. We are responsible for means and not for results. Fretfulness is not augmentation, but depletion. The successful Christian workers are without exception cheerful. They do the best they can and then leave the matter with God. We excuse an occasional fit of the "blues," but when the disease becomes chronic, the man has all he can do to take care of himself, and has no time for the improvement of others.

If you have the salt rheum, and a man offer you a box of salve that he says will certainly cure you, and you observe that he has on his hand the same disease unhealed, you say, "No, I thank you: if your medicine were worth anything you would cure your own hands." So there is no use in a morbid man of gloomy heart attempting to raise others out of spiritual misfortunes, because his shadowed soul is a slander on his medicine. A man must have both his own feet solidly planted on the Rock before he can pull sinking men out of the floods.

It seems that in the olden time, as well as now, there were naughty people abroad. In seventeen hundred and eighty-eight, Dominie Rubel, of Flatbush, was deposed from the ministry for various irregularities, and went to doctoring the body instead of the soul, and advertised, "It has pleased Almighty God to give me wisdom to find out the universal pill that will cure most diseases."

We are afraid of the descendants of Dominie Rubel, who are attempting with some universal pill to correct the world's disorders. Look out for the quacks in all departments, and the country grocery which has on its shelves patent medicines for the extirpation of all complaints from run-a-round to catalepsy. A potion that proposes at the same time to rejuvenate liver, spleen, brain, nerves, and cuticle, is a lie on the face of it. A gunner trying to shoot in ten directions at once will hit none of the targets. We believe in specialists. The anatomy of the human ear is enough to employ a man's genius for a lifetime, likewise the eye. He who professes to know everything knows nothing. When you get sick you had better call in a doctor who does not make extravagant pretensions. Beware of the universal pill.

Sometimes a good and talented man will go off on a tangent. He has found out something in the educational, mechanical, or scientific world that will renovate and reconstruct everything. It will make the earth over again. He is crazy to have everybody take it. "Down with this pill," he says, "it is a corrective for everything." But the prescriptions are apt to get mixed.

There are Christians who have for a long while had "the blues," "the dumps," "the high strikes," common names for depressed spirits, who would be amazingly helped by a mid-winter excursion. But do not think we have any fondness for icy churches or Christians. We have too much of that already: prayer-meetings on ice, sermons on ice, religion on ice, churches frozen over with formalities, ministers congealed in worldliness. But we have an idea that anything that is good for the health of the body is good for the health of the soul. We think that out-door exercise on brisk mid-winter days would have a tendency to decrease spiritual frigidity.

THE POWER OF CHEERFULNESS.

HAVE you never noticed the power of one cheerful Christian life? Have you never seen a girl in a household who, having given her heart to God, goes through the family a joyous epistle of religion, until the father comes to believe, and the mother comes to believe, and all the brothers and sisters come to believe? Have you never seen the power of one Christian man in a village, going from house to house, and from shop to shop, and from store to store, living out the brighter phases of the Christian life, by his manner recommending the gladdest religion that the world ever saw? I do not think that any of us have fully tested the power of a Christian sun-bath, of a beaming face, of exhilarant Christian behavior.

I received lately from London a picture of much power, and it came to me in this wise: Some years ago, when in London, I was in the study of Thomas Carlyle, and I saw a picture of that famous man that struck my eye, although I could readily believe, from the gloom on the countenance, what I was told, that it was taken one day when he had a toothache. When I came home, I wrote some things in regard to that picture, and those words in regard to it got across the water again, and the artist who had made the picture read what I said about it, and afterward wrote to me saying: "I shall send you a copy of that picture. There had been but two copies of it taken, and one I will send you." It came later. It is a suggestive picture to my eye—the rugged forehead, the deep set-eye, the powerful features; but all the time you cannot help but think: "This is Thomas Carlyle with a toothache." There are a great many men abroad in the world that are living a rugged, earnest, brilliant Christian life in some respects, and yet all the time it is religion with a pang, religion with a gloom, religion with a toothache.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

The following additional names have been received as members of the Corresponding Circle for spiritual improvement, suggested by "Reader." Ont., Can.:

Mrs. Macdonald, 2358 Annunciation street, New Orleans; Ettie A. Chandler, Harrisburg, Ia.; Charles Coleman, Ward, Colo.; E. Amanda Johnson, Greenfield, Ia.; Elam Tout, Camargo, Pa.; L. M. Bell, Grand Junction, Colo.; Jonas Loranson, Biwabik, Minn.; Alfred A. Davis, Republican City, Neb.; Myra R. French, Colebrook River, Conn.; Tennie and Canna Card, Maynard's Cove, Ala.

A. A. J. C., Ontario, Can. When and where did St. Patrick die and what was his religious belief?

According to tradition, he died at Downpatrick, Ireland, the scene of his earliest successes as a missionary teacher of the Gospel, on March 17, 493. He was a Christian of the early Roman Church, and did much to win the Irish people from idolatry and druidical superstition.

R. Loomis, Atlanta, Ga. What is Gladstone's religious belief?

He is a devout Christian and a believer in Christian progress and practice. In a recent conversation he declared that his faith in Christianity increases with the years, and that to him the only one question in the world was, "How to bring the divine revelation to the heart of the human race."

A. E. Lawrence, Little Prairie Ronde, Mich. 1. Would it be consistent for a military band composed of ladies and gentlemen, nearly all of whom are Christians, to play at a trotting-matinee or at a fair where the speeding of horses formed a part of the programme? 2. Would it be proper for the same organization to rehearse any but sacred, vocal, band or orchestral music on Sundays after taking their full part in religious services; it being understood that it was not convenient for all to meet during the week, and that the Sabbath rehearsal would be at a time and place that would disturb no one?

1. Such a proceeding would be inconsistent with the Christian profession, since it would be giving countenance to a sport which is allied with gambling and, therefore, condemned by moral people generally. 2. See answer to "Old Subscriber," in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Feb. 20.

Capt. O. R. Van Etten, Vernon Centre, Minn., writes:

I see a picture in your issue of Feb. 13 of a post-office in South Dakota, (Goudyville.) It is a very striking picture, not only of the office, but of the stage and its driver, Miss Estella Lytle. That route starts at Highmore in the main line of the N. W. R. R., making a trip of fifty-two miles each day; stopping at four post-offices and ending up at Seneca. Miss Lytle made that entire trip each day last summer, to my certain knowledge, for seven weeks and never lost a trip. A year ago this winter, at a time when it is impossible to proceed with sleigh or cart, she mounted a broncho and took the mail through on schedule time.

I live within a few miles of that post-office and this stage passes through my yard and across my land, and while that is a sod house and a sod post-office, it is a very comfortable one. I don't think there is any destitution in that section of the State.

C. B. G. What were the seasons in the olden times? What were the months, and in what way do they correspond with the months now?

The Hebrew year was composed of 12 (and occasionally of 13) lunar months of 30 and 29 days alternately. The months were: Abib or Nisan, Ijar, Sivan, Tammuz, Ab, Elul, Tisri, Marchesvan, Chislen, Tebeth, Shebat, and Adar, the intercalary or extra month being called Ve-Adar, or the second month of Adar. The Passover occurred during Nisan (parallel with March-April). The Assyrian and Babylonian year consisted of twelve lunar months. As to seasons, the same four general divisions were observed as have prevailed the world over since time began. In Abib came the barley harvest, Sivan (parallel with our May), brought the wheat harvest, Elul, the vintage, maize and pomegranates, and Tisri ushered in the Feast of Tabernacles. Wheat and barley were sown in Marchesvan (our October-November), and the year ended with the close of Adar or Ve-Adar.

H. S. W., Scranton, and "Subscriber." Is it right for a Christian church to open its doors for fairs, concerts, suppers, &c., when the building has been dedicated to God for pure worship?

While the social side of church life should be cultivated, it is desirable that fairs, suppers, and similar matters having in no direct sense a spiritual side, should be held elsewhere. There are, however, some social features that may with perfect propriety be held in the church building, such as concerts of a proper character, lectures and the like. If we apply the test of conscience in such matters and ask ourselves whether the holding of any special gathering within church walls is derogatory of the sacred purposes to which the building is dedicated, a decision will not be difficult to reach.

Constant Reader, Brooklyn. Can a person be a consistent Christian and still remain away from Church—not on account of invalidism, or for any other reason than mere lack of desire to go there? Can they do God's work by sitting in the parlor on Sundays reading the Bible by themselves?

Such a person as you describe who, while having at hand the opportunity to enjoy the ordinances of religion and the assembling of God's people, yet persistently and contemptuously neglects them, may be a Christian, but can hardly be expected to be of much service in the work of the Kingdom. Such an attitude is inconsistent with the true Christian spirit which yields a joyous compliance to the command to confess Christ before men (Matt. 10: 32: Luke 12: 8), which takes a special pleasure in the public assembling of his followers (Heb. 10: 25), and to whom the ordinances instituted by the Church from ancient times, are still sacred and worthy of remembrance. (I. Cor. 11: 2; Heb. 9: 1; Psalm 84: 10.)

J. P. Snyder, Hepburn, Pa. 1. What was the fate of the twelve apostles? 2. What is Dr. Talmage's latest work, finished or being prepared?

1. St. Peter was crucified in Rome, head downward, on a cross similar to that used in the execution of Jesus. St. Andrew was bound to a cross and left to die of exhaustion. St. James the Great, was beheaded by order of Herod at Jerusalem. St. James the Less, was thrown from a high pinnacle, then stoned and finally killed with a fuller's club. Jude was martyred in Phœnicia. St. Philip was bound and hanged against a pillar. St. Bartholomew was flayed to death by command of a barbarous king. St. Matthew was killed with a halbert. St. Thomas was shot by a shower of arrows while at prayer, and afterward run through the body with a lance. St. Simon was crucified after the manner of Jesus. St. John died a natural death. St. Paul was beheaded by command of Nero. Judas "fell and his bowels gushed out." 2. "From Manger to Throne" is his latest. It is presented as a premium to new annual $2 subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Apropos of our Western Relief Fund, many interesting letters have been received from friends, recalling former instances of spontaneous Christian liberality. Mr. John R——, of Ashton, Neb., writes:

The contributions made weekly for the destitute of our famine-stricken communities makes THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a welcome messenger. We sent our contributions two years ago for the Russian sufferers, and twenty years ago, when our corn crop was destroyed by the grasshoppers, the good people east responded to our call liberally. With others, I solicited seed corn in Iowa for Sherman county, and thirty-six years ago we were living in St. Charles, Ill., when a call came from Kansas for the same purpose. I spent two weeks, myself and team, in collecting wheat and beans, some three hundred bushels of the former and forty of the latter, and got it made into flour and shipped to Gov. Pomeroy free of charge. This fact I had forgotten until a short time ago in writing my biography I was reminded of it by my better-half, who says it was four hundred bushels instead of three hundred. Our beloved Jesus will make a correct record of our deeds, both good and bad. The twenty-fifth of this month will be my eighty-third birthday anniversary.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

APPROACHING CHINA'S EMPEROR.

TWO obstacles have heretofore prevented the cordial approach of foreign ministers to the Emperor of China. One was that the person coming into the presence of the Emperor must "kotow," that is, kneel three times and touch the floor with his forehead three times at each kneeling. The second was that no foreigner could be received in the Imperial palace. The Chinese hold that their Emperor is, by right, ruler over the whole world of which China is the Middle Kingdom. The place for receptions in accord with this theory was a building outside the palace enclosure where the Emperor might receive the homage of persons from distant lands who represent potentates holding office by the sufferance of the Emperor. China has now for some time past been learning by painful experience that these ridiculous pretensions are not justified by facts and the present Emperor, Kuang Hsu, has given practical evidence of the change. In the course of the recent fetes in celebration of the sixtieth birthday of his aunt, the Empress Dowager, who is the most powerful lady in China, the Emperor waived both the obstacles to the audience of the foreign ambassadors and held a reception for them. The picture on this page is taken from a drawing made by an eyewitness of the scene. The reception took place within the precincts of the Pink City which had never before been profaned by the feet of a foreigner. Into this sacred enclosure the ambassadors were conducted, in the order of their rank. On entering the throne-room, they saw the Emperor attired in a violet cloak and a fur cap, seated behind a table covered with a yellow cloth, yellow being the color reserved for the use of the Emperor and those to whom he delegates his authority. He is twenty-four years of age and has an extremely youthful appearance. The ambassadors say that he has a sympathetic face, of a light color, broad forehead and heavy eyebrows above a pair of beautiful, big, flashing eyes. The members of his foreign council were grouped around him and acquainted him with the name and nationality of each ambassador as he entered. The ceremonies were brief but full of significance to persons familiar with the past history of China. The Chinese themselves are amazed at the Emperor's condescension. It may be hoped that they will learn from the missionaries among them that an infinitely greater privilege is open to the most humble of the people—that of entering the presence of the King of kings and holding communion with him. (Isa. 57: 15.)

RECEPTION OF A FOREIGN AMBASSADOR BY THE EMPEROR OF CHINA.

Electric Ground.

An astonishing series of equine troubles was witnessed in New Haven, Conn., a few days ago. A teamster who had left his team on the corner of York and Elm streets while he made a purchase, had scarcely entered the store, when his horses suddenly gave a leap and started off in a mad career down the street. A farmer driving slowly around the same corner in his buggy shortly afterward was startled by his old horse rearing and dashing away at a pace he had never attempted even in his young days. Every horse that came to the place was affected and one fell to the ground trembling in every limb and in evident pain and was with difficulty saved from dying. The cause was discovered by an electrician who happened to pass. Overhead are the wires of two trolley railroad companies, and below the surface are conduits containing telephone and telegraph wires. The air on that day contained an unusual quantity of humidity, and the electrician said he had no doubt that a connection had been established between the wires above and below the ground, by the moist atmosphere, and so the ground had become charged with electricity. The metal shoes on the horses' feet had caused them to feel it before others and accounted for their antics. As there was nothing in the appearance of the ground to indicate that it differed from any other part of the street, the drivers took no notice of people who warned them away, but drove on, and not until their horses were on the mysterious area did they realize that it was dangerous. There was consequently for several hours a succession of runaways and other difficulties that were more amusing to the crowd that collected than to the drivers and their horses. Similar unheeded warnings are often uttered about places of amusement, which appear incapable of doing harm. It is often difficult to explain wherein the danger consists, but experience proves that they are harmful. When there is evil all around a place, as there was electricity about this street-corner, the atmosphere of it is liable to lead to results that are fatal to spiritual life. Solomon's advice in such matters is worth following: "Enter not into the path of the wicked and go not in the way of evil: avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it and pass away." (Prov. 4: 15, 16.)

A Mansion Desecrated.

The police of the most northern precinct of New York City made a surprising discovery last week. There have been many burglaries in that district recently, and it was a mystery how the thieves could have carried their plunder away without being noticed. They could easily convey it along the roads of the neighborhood, there being little traffic there at night, but to bring it into the city, as it was thought they must do, would arouse suspicion. There are no houses there were thieves would be likely to live, yet they seemed to disappear as completely as if they had some convenient resort. The mystery was solved accidentally. The captain of a pleasure yacht lying in the Harlem River had occasion to go on board late one night, and as he approached the dock he saw five men leave his vessel. Suspecting that they had been robbing it, he concealed himself until they had passed and then followed them. He saw them enter the grounds of a fine, old mansion, and passing through, enter the house as if they were quite at home. He gave information to the police, who made a raid on the house and captured the whole gang. In the basement of the house was stored a large quantity of plunder, evidently the product of several burglaries. The thieves had supplied themselves with choice wines, spirits, and cigars, and were apparently living in luxury. The mansion belongs to one of New York's most aristocratic families, and has in its time been the scene of assemblages of historic fame. It is sad to think of its being used in its old age as a resort for thieves. But it is infinitely more deplorable to see a much more common spectacle—that of a human being who might be a temple in which God would dwell, being occupied by the demons of lust, anger and malice to its irreparable damage. (1. Cor. 3: 16, 17.)

Newly Discovered Element.

An interesting discovery was described on Feb. 15 by Prof. Ira Remsen at a meeting of the Johns Hopkins Scientific Association, at Baltimore. It is nothing less than a constituent of the atmosphere, the existence of which has never before been suspected. It appears from his statement that the discovery was made by two Englishmen, one of whom is a professor of Physics, and the other a Professor of Chemistry. They found that nitrogen obtained from the air was heavier than nitrogen obtained from chemical substances. The reason was not apparent and the professors set themselves to find it out. After various experiments they discovered it. They knew that chemical nitrogen was entirely absorbed when passed over highly heated magnesium. When the same test was applied to atmospheric nitrogen, something was left. This was the thing the professors had been searching for. It has been thoroughly examined and tested in various ways. The result satisfies the professors that it is an element. It differs from all other substances that have hitherto been studied, and will not combine with any substance or gas, beside nitrogen. There is only one per cent. of it in the air and it is extremely inactive. The professors have given it the name of Argon, which is composed of two Greek words signifying inactivity. It seems extraordinary to the ordinary mind that while scientists have been making wonderful discoveries in the distant parts of the universe and have for centuries been learning more about the stars millions of miles away, there has all along been a constituent of the very air we breathe, the presence of which they did not suspect. Too many of them show a similar lack of perception in spiritual things. While they are intensely interested in questions about nebulæ and the fixed stars, they are indifferent to the things in which they have a vital and eternal concern. (Luke 12: 56.)

Naturalization Refused.

An application for naturalization papers came before Judge Pryor on March 2. The applicant was a Spaniard who produced the requisite evidence of having been five years in the country and showed his first papers. A casual remark led to the Judge questioning the man as to his motive for wishing to become a citizen. He replied that he was about removing to Cuba and as a revolution was in progress there he thought he would be safer if he had the protection of the United States Government. The Judge reminded him that his application declared his intention of residing permanently in the United States and added that as the country did not desire citizens merely for the privilege of protecting them while in other lands he should refuse the application. The man evidently wanted to secure the privileges of a citizen without performing any of the duties of citizenship and the Judge showed his good sense in refusing him. There are many who would like to become citizens in Christ's kingdom on those terms. They want to live as worldlings in the world, but to go to heaven when they die. Christ will will have no such followers. He distinctly says, Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me cannot be my disciple. (Luke 14: 27.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Letters Recently Received from Mr. Henry Varley report a deep religious interest in Australia. Mr. Varley says the greatest object is "to make the story full, rich, delightful, and he is gaining in depth and strength."

English Newspapers Notice Incidentally the romantic devotion of the aged widow of Sir John Goss. She made it her last request before her death which occurred recently, that her husband's letters should be buried in the coffin with her. This package included letters bearing the date of 1816, written when Sir John was sixteen years of age.

Evangelist George C. Needham reports Excellent results from the Bible Conferences he has been holding in various districts. He says: 'Since January 6th we have visited about eight cities and towns, remaining about five days in each place. Nearly 250 addresses have been given and over thirty pastors have assisted as speakers. The next Conferences will be at Somerville, Mass. March 17-23 and Boston, March 24-30.

The Young Empress of Russia is an accomplished linguist. She is able to express herself freely and readily in Russian, German, English, French and Italian. She is said to be an extremely well-read and charming woman. Her mother, the Princess Alice of England, was an earnest Christian.

Miss De Broen has Opened a Soup Kitchen in connection with her institutions in Paris. There is terrible distress in Belleville and Miss De Broen is doing much good by selling the soup at cost price and by giving away in cases of extreme poverty all that her funds will permit her to give.

A Cable Message from Constantinople, reports that the missionaries of the American Board in Armenia are again being persecuted by the Turkish authorities. The Turkish officials charge them with importing arms and storing them for use against the Mohammedans. An excuse is evidently being sought for driving them out of the country.

At the Wedding on March 4th of Miss Anna Gould, the daughter of the late Jay Gould, a thousand orphan children on the East side of New York were feasted at the expense of the millionaire bride. The entertainment took place in the Allen Street Memorial Church and the Home Industrial School. It may be hoped that the day will come when all our millionaires will remember Christ's injunction to invite the poor when they make a feast.

Church Members Seeking Employment, or who wish to add to their incomes, may find it to their interest to send their address to Box J, Station D, New York.

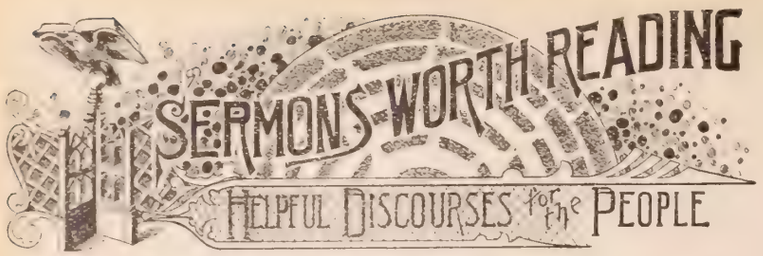
Dr. M. H. Pogson of New York, has been holding revival services at Malone, N. Y., and a widespread interest has been aroused. Many additions have been made to the churches and there are many still seeking Christ as a result of the services.

Rev. J. F. Carson, Pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, has been holding services at Allegheny City, Pa., in the United Presbyterian Church. The meetings were largely attended and about forty persons made profession of faith and united with the church.

Captain and Mrs. S. G. Neil, the Scotch Evangelists, began preaching in the Baptist Church of Erie, Pa., early in February. The Erie Herald says: 'Never in the memory of the present generation in this city have such crowds of people regularly attended night meetings held by a single church. The city is feeling the influence of the meeting to its utmost bounds.'

Dr. L. W. Munhall is Holding Evangelistic services at Saginaw, Mich. Mr. Firch goes with him to take charge of the musical services. Their meetings at Iowa City, Ia., just concluded, were very successful. The "Signal Light" of that city says that the audiences in the Armory numbered not less than eighteen hundred persons, and that at the meetings for young men only, fully twelve hundred were present. There were many conversions.

The American Institute of Christian Philosophy has decided to devote all the money in its treasury to perpetuating the memory of its founder, the late Dr. Charles F. Deems. The memorial is to be a lectureship at the University of the City of New York. Six lectures are to be delivered annually or bi-ennally by some eminent man, either European or American, to be chosen by a board of trustees, the subject to be scientific or philosophical. The cost will be defrayed by the proceeds of the fund donated by the Institute. We believe that Dr. Deems would have been more gratified by this kind of memorial than any other.



THE WAITING GOD.

One of the last Sermons preached by Dr. A. J. Gordon in the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, and Revised by him for "The Christian Herald." *

Text: II Peter 3 9. "The Lord is not slack concerning his promise; as some men count slackness; but is longsuffering to usward, not willing that any should perish."

THIS is the answer of the Lord to the scoffers who say: "Where is the sign of his coming?" It is an answer in which mercy and warning are mingled. Those who deride the doctrine of the Lord's coming are not comforted with the assurance that he will not return; but warned that he will come like a thief in the night and overwhelm with astonishment those who had derided his promise. On the other hand the mercy and forbearance of God are magnified and delay translated to mean long-suffering. Consider then:

1. The Lord's slowness is not slackness. Justice is not lazy because it is slow. It often pursues the sinner with tardy steps only that it may give an opportunity for mercy to step in before it and capture its victim out of its hands. God is in order that his forgiveness may outrun his judgment. There seems to be a designed slowness in God's intercourse with us so that there may be a place for our prayers and pleadings. "Ask and ye shall receive" is God's law in dealing with his children. And he must not make such haste in giving that our asking shall be precluded. You remember how in our Lord's journey to Emmaus with his disciples as they drew near to the village "he made as though he would go further:" and thus drew from them that beautiful prayer: "Abide with us for it is toward evening and the day is far spent." Christ will never consent to come into our hearts or our homes as an unbidden guest. Therefore he draws forth the prayer of invitation before he consents to enter in and tarry. Recall again his delay in answering the pleading of the Syro-Phœnician woman—a delay that seemed almost cruel in both its time and tone. For he not only holds off his blessing: but he seems to grudge his mercy. "It is not meet to take the children's bread and give it to the dogs." But the end vindicates the method. He held back in his giving that he might draw forth her importunity and enable her to win a crown for her faith, "Oh woman, be it unto thee as thou wilt." Read the same significant lesson in the parable of the unjust judge. The woman pleaded her cause, saying: "Avenge me of my adversary." But "he would not for a while." Yet this fact only made her

Double Her Opportunity.

His delay drew out her persistence. The more he held off the more she held on, until he gave in and said: "I will avenge her lest she wear me out by her continual coming." And then observe the question which our Lord asks as founded on the parable: "Nevertheless when the Son of man cometh will he find the faith on the earth?" The faith that holds on when rebuffed; that perseveres when pushed away; that will not take denial. This is the kind of faith that God aims to beget and nourish by all his discipline of delay. If, as many hold, this parable refers to our Lord's second coming and the widowed church importuning him to return and vindicate her against her persecutors, its force is very powerful. He taught us to pray daily, "Even so come, Lord Jesus." But how has the church been praying and how long has he tarried! The blood of the martyrs cries out from beneath the altar: "How long, O Lord, how long dost thou not judge and avenge our blood." And yet the heavens have been silent for ages and God has held his peace; silent while his saints have suffered; silent while his servants have been slain; silent while creation has groaned and travailed in pain waiting for the adoption. But says the sure word of prophecy: "But our God shall come and shall not keep silence and it shall be very tempestuous round about him." And they who persecuted God's widowed church and drew her into the wilderness shall be brought to desolation in a moment. God's delays therefore are

Our Discipline.

Pallissy the potter in his experiments in his art found that the great problem to be solved was this: To keep the vessels in the fire just long enough to bring out the full beauty of the colors—the gold and purple and crimson and green—and yet not render the vessels brittle and fragile, so that they should crack. And God who constantly calls his people clay in the hands of the potter, wants to bring out all the varied perfections of our faith, each color and tint bright and clear that so we may be "vessels unto honor, meet for the Master's use." Therefore the long delay while the fire burns hot about us. The Lord is not slack concerning his promises, but he is firm concerning his purposes.

Again there seems to be a necessary slowness in God's dealing out his rewards and punishments. A hot-tempered man is always wanting in dignity and grace of character. How much more unbecoming would be a hot-tempered God. I say it reverently: If the Almighty were to fly into a passion and take vengeance on such men as Col. Ingersoll every time they insulted and blasphemed him, for him would be vastly lowered. "The Lord is slow to anger." There is infinite dignity and grandeur in that expression. An infidel stood on the platform of the Music Hall many years ago and before a large audience took out his watch and said: "It is now five minutes to nine. If there be a personal God I ask him to prove his existence by striking me dead within the next five minutes." And some good Christians wondered why God did not do it. As well wonder why the Duke of Wellington would not turn aside from the battle of Waterloo to chastise some naughty boys who are making faces at him because they hated the cause for which he was fighting. Some ten times in different parts of Scripture we have these words repeated: "God is slow to anger." And they occur several times in connection with some outbreaking sin of his people. As though to admonish us that however exasperating man's disobedience, God is not easily provoked so that he should lose his self-control, and he who times his judgments by the clock of eternities should not get angry at the tick of an infidel's watch. But let us not take comfort in this fact as though delay meant indifference and his carelessness meant weak indulgence.

Delay is Patience.

2. The Lord's slowness is longsuffering. "The day of judgment is due according to the clock of the ages," says the watchman. "Why then is it delayed?" If you had told your son that unless he should repent and confess his sin before twelve o'clock you would punish him severely, would not your tender and reluctant heart lead you to permit the hands of the clock to slip past the hour in the hope that he might yet repent and own his sin? And would it not be adding perverseness to perversity for that son to taunt his father with slackness in keeping his promise? Yet this is what God accuses us of doing. "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil," says the Scripture. Alas is it so with any of you that God's forbearance has been made the occasion of renewed persistency in wrongdoing? I know that the fire which melts the wax, hardens the clay and renders it brittle and fragile: and I see that the goodness of God which should dissolve the heart in penitence and unseal all the fountains of tears, has made many of you all the more persistent in your worldliness and unbelief. But I warn you that "though hand join in hand the wicked shall not go unpunished." And yet how reluctant our Redeemer is to enter upon his work of judgment. To show to blot out transgressions is his most coveted employment. So much so that he invokes blessing upon those who curse him most bitterly. We call David a good man: yet mark the difference between the death of David and the death of the Son of David. When David drew nigh to death he said to his son Solomon: "Thou knowest what Joab the son of Zeruiah did to me. . . . how he shed the blood of war in peace and put the blood of war upon his girdle that was about his loins and in his shoes that were on his feet. Do thou, therefore, according to thy wisdom and let not his hoary head go down to the grave in peace. And behold thou hast with thee Shimei, the son of Gera, a Benjamite of Bahurim, which cursed me with a grievous curse in the day when I went to Mahanaim . . . . Now, therefore, hold him not guiltless, but his hoary head bring thou down to the grave with blood. So David slept with his fathers and was buried in the city of David." (I. Kings 2: 5.) This was a man who lived under the law whose cold tables of stone spoke only death to the offender. But come with me to Calvary and see how the Son of David dies under grace. There were the Roman soldiers who drove through his hands and his feet. There were the Scribes and Pharisees taunting him and saying: "He saved others, himself he could not save." There were the white-haired priests and elders through whose hatred he had been put to death. And what does the Son of David say concerning them? Does he say: "O, God avenge me of my adversaries: let not their grey hairs go down to the grave in peace." No. O, wondrous culmination of a long-suffering life. He cries out concerning these his enemies: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Mercy is His Dear Delight:

And he did not cease to pray when he died upon the cross. He rose from the dead: he ascended to heaven where he ever liveth to make intercession for sinners. He is lifting his nail-pierced hands to God on your behalf. He has said that if he went away he would come back again; and men are shaking the head and incredulously asking, "Where is the sign of his coming?" But he is not slack concerning his promise, as men count slackness; but he is long-suffering and not willing that any should perish. He is slow to exchange the office of intercessor for that of judge. He is slow to exchange the prayer, "Father, forgive them" for "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." Oh man, oh woman still impenitent and hard of heart, will you abuse his patience?

Death Held Back.

Remember that he has the power of life and death. He has the keys of the grave as well as the keys of the kingdom of heaven. And he keeps you in life that you may repent and receive the remission of sins.

Dr. Westmoreland, an eminent army surgeon, tells of a soldier who was shot in the neck, the ball just grazing and wounding the carotid artery. The doctor knew that his life hung on a hair; and one day as he was dressing the wound the walls of the artery gave way. Instantly the surgeon pressed his finger upon the vein, and held the blood in check; and the patient asked, "What does this mean?" "It means that you are a dead man," answered the doctor. "How long can I live?" "As long as I keep my hand on the artery." "Can I have time to dictate a letter to my wife and child?" "Yes." And so the letter was written for him, full of tender farewell messages, closing with an expression of trust in Christ and assurance of departing to be with him, and when all was finished he calmly closed his eyes and said, "I am ready, doctor." The purple tide ebbed quickly away and all was over. What a parable is here of a far more solemn fact. Oh, unsaved one, you are by nature "dead through tresspasses and sins." Because of your transgression the death sentence has been passed on you. But God keeps his hand upon your pulse, preserving your life and holding death back that you may have time for repentance. Every day his long-suffering hand slips from some artery and the red tide rushes out and the pale form tells that all is over. How long will he hold you in life? I know not; only that he is waiting for you to repent. His heart yearns for you as you remain indifferent. "How can I give thee up?" he asks again and again. You wake and pass the day still with no thought of God and then lie down to a prayerless sleep. But he slumbers not nor sleeps. His hand is on your life current, keeping it from breaking over its banks. He waits for you to stretch forth suppliant hands to him crying: "Father I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son." But he waits in vain saying, "All day long have I stretched forth my hands to a disobedient and gainsaying people." How long will you make him wait? Now cry unto him: "Father, I give my heart to thee."

FROM THE BOWERY TO MOROCCO.

A strange experience lies behind a young man who is now on his way to preach the Gospel of Christ to Jews in Morocco. He is the son of Jewish parents. As a boy he was visiting in a Christian home, and was much struck by seeing a child in the family, when guilty of some offence, fold his hands in prayer and ask pardon in the name of Jesus. The next time he got into trouble at home he determined to resort to the same method of obtaining consolation. He had not long to wait; being crossed in his purpose he got angry, and, remembering his intention, he retired into an adjoining bed-room and asked God in the name of Jesus Christ to forgive him. Unfortunately for him, as it appeared, there were only folding doors between the bedroom and the sitting-room in which his Jewish father was reading. On hearing the despised name on the lips of his son, the father rushed in and in a furious rage shook his son, forbidding him at his peril to name that name again in his house. The incident passed, and although the boy was surprised at his father's vehemence, he thought nothing more of the affair as he knew nothing of Jesus, but had used the name much as one might use a charm or talisman.

When the boy grew up he came to the United States on an extended pleasure trip. While in New York he strolled about the city looking at the sights, and one evening went down the Bowery. Hearing singing in one of the resorts he turned in, thinking he was visiting a concert-hall. It proved to be a Mission. He would have quitted it at once, but some people at the door spoke kindly to him and induced him to wait and hear more of the singing. Presently his new acquaintance asked him: "Are you a Christian?" He said, "No." "Would you not like to be a Christian?" He replied "No; I don't know anything about it. I am a Jew." "But salvation is for the Jews as well as for the Gentiles." "That's strange," he replied, "for nobody has ever told me about it. As the result, he went in to a side-room, and learned from the lips of his friend that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah of Israel; and he believed the Gospel. That is nearly ten years ago. The young man is now going out at his own cost to Morocco a Missionary to his people.

UNTIL THE DAY BREAK.

(Song of Solomon 2: 17.)

'TIS daybreak over the mountains now,
See the shadows flee from each lofty brow
And the city below is astir with life;
For the day has begun with its toil and strife.

And the tramp of the early toilers' feet
Is heard as they hasten along the street,
And the windows are opened one by one
To welcome the rays of the rising sun.

In yonder home there is sorrow and care,
In the shades of night death entered there
And gathered the fairest flower, then left
The empty home, and the hearts bereft.

But we bury our dead from our sight and then Take up the burdens of life again,
Nor long shall our night of sorrow be;
For the day will break and the shadows flee.

THE MORNING STAR.

Written for The Christian Herald.

HOW beauteous is the cloudless night,
When every star gives forth its light,
It brings to mind the One more bright,
Which is the Morning Star.

Dark was the path of sin I led,
Each coming day was only dread,
Till I beheld a gleam o'erhead,
Of Christ, the Morning Star.

I followed its inviting ray,
Made it my sole support and stay,
Till now there shines o'er all my way,
The radiant Morning Star.

I do not fear when storms arise,
And hopes lie crushed before my eyes—
There still is shining in the skies,
The blessed Morning Star.

It is of all the host the gem,
The one most precious diadem,
The star that shone on Bethlehem—
The glorious Morning Star.

Shine on, O Star, in splendor bright,
From shore to shore diffuse thy light,
Till every soul in sin's dark night,
Shall know the Morning Star.

—MRS. V. A. BELDEN.

CHRISTIAN COMFORT.

TRUSTING in a God above,
Holding out a hand of love,
Ever seeking while you live,
Christian sympathy to give.

Hearts of many that were sad,
Round the hearthstone now are glad,
In the fulness of their board,
Surely God will you reward.

Tell them now of richer lands,
In a world not made with hands;
All the year a harvest time,
Never want can reach that clime.

Round the throne where seraphs bow,
Angels bear the record now.
Lingering long to tell the story,
Deeds of earth to crown in glory.

THE NIGHT FAR SPENT.

The Difference Between the Church and the Kingdom, and the Characteristics of the Prophetic Day and Night.

GOOD news is it that the night is far spent. It has lasted long but it is nearly ended. We have endured it in the night of death's desolation. The history of this fallen world is most emphatically the history of death. Death has reigned, not only "from Adam to Moses," and from Moses to Christ, but even from Christ to the present hour, and still the veil of its dreadful night is spread over the world. By what a natural association of ideas do we speak of "the night of death." Oh! ye bereaved ones, believing, how may ye rejoice in the thought that the night of death is far spent! One by one we have laid the beloved ones—parents, friends, children—in the silent tomb. Year after year we have heard as John Foster says, "the thunder of death's wings," and upon many the darkness which those awful wings create will soon be falling. But glorious tidings! —"the night is far spent, the day is at hand." Yes, as the hymn has it,—

The night is wearing fast away,
The glorious light is dawning;
I see the streaks of coming day,
The bright Millennial morning.

"The day is at hand!" What day? We have seen some of the characteristics of the far-spent night. What kind of day is it that the Apostle so joyfully encourages us to look forward to?

It is the day of creation's deliverance. For this the winds are sighing, as they make their sweet but melancholy music amid the leafy groves of summer; for this the wild waves cry aloud, as they dash themselves upon the rocky shore; for this the starving beasts of the forest, and the birds perishing in the cruel frost, and all the innocent, suffering creatures God has made, send up to him their constant inarticulate prayer. "For the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now" (Rom. 8: 19-22). But in what exquisite contrast is the picture of the coming Millennial day which Isaiah presents, when the curse is removed, and the world is, as it were, new-born: "For ye shall go out with joy,— not with shame and sorrow, as Adam went forth from Eden,—and be led forth with peace: the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands."

Oh, that is a blessed thought! "The day is at hand." The day when all Nature's wounds shall be healed; when her sorrowing heart shall be comforted; and when, as in a mirror from which all obscurations have been removed, she shall truly reflect the glory of her Creator.

Again, the day which the Apostle declares to be at hand is the day of resurrection-life. Oh, glorious day! when disease and death shall no more torture and destroy "this trembling house of clay;" when by the possession of nobler powers, we shall be fitted for a nobler though not more respectable service than we have been able to render here; when that which was "sown in corruption shall be raised in incorruption, and that which was sown in weakness shall be raised in power, and that which is now a natural body shall be raised a spiritual body."

Lastly, "the day" which not only inspired testimony, but many concurrent signs also assure us is even now "at hand," is the day of Christ's personal presence. As long as he is absent, the night continues, for is he not the Sun of the moral and spiritual world? Yea, even before he rises on the world as the Sun of Righteousness, he will be to his waiting and watching saints "the bright and morning star." In vain do we hope that the night shall end and the shadows flee away till the Day-star shines in the eastern sky; in vain we look for the dawn of Millennial day till "the Sun of Righteousness arise, with healing in his wings." No rest for creation till Christ comes; no binding of Satan till Christ comes; no Millennium till Christ comes; no glorious resurrection-life till Christ comes; no consummation of bliss in body and soul till Christ comes; for in his presence only is fulness of joy, and on the wings of his love and power he brings the everlasting day. And, oh, glorious assurance! that day is about to dawn. Yes, every year, every day brings it nearer; "the night is far spent, the day is at hand."

HEART PURITY.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Mar. 24. Matt. 23: 25-28; Ps. 51: 6-10.

HISTORY shows that the decline of true religion is always accompanied by a more careful observance of forms and ceremonies. The building of splendid temples, the payment of tithes, disputes about the sacraments, are not characteristic of a time when men are holding fast to their faith and are concerned about the purity of their lives. There seems to be a natural tendency in man to offer God something in the nature of a compromise when obedience is withheld. It was always easier to offer an animal in sacrifice, or to go through some religious rite than to yield up some gross appetite, or to abstain from some forbidden indulgence. We have seen conspicuous instances of the disposition even in our own time. Some of the men who have astonished the world by their defalcations and others who have secretly led immoral lives, have been remarkable for their regular attendance at church, for their insistance on a particular mode of baptism and for their rigid observance of the Lord's Day, which they generally call "the Sabbath." No pious man has a word to say against any of these things; he commends them, but of themselves they are insufficient for the fulfilment of God's law. They are externals, while religion is a matter of the heart. Even an orthodox creed, important as that is, is not sufficient for salvation. We are told that the devils believe, and it was not for herodoxy or neglect of religious observance that Christ denounced the Pharisees. Even to Nicodemus, a man whose outward conduct was doubtless irreproachable, Christ insisted that regeneration was essential. Again and again in the Old Testament, as in the New, the men whom God commissioned to declare his will have warned the people that it is the heart to which God looks and by which he judges. Evil thoughts and evil desires shut a man out of the Kingdom. The man who lives a clean life and is strictly moral, is not saved if he loves sin in his heart and would commit it, if all restraints were removed. That there are in the best of men inclinations to do evil is admitted, but they may exist in spite of the general determination of a man's life upward. The passions of the flesh may rebel, even after they are subdued and held in subjection, but the regenerated man hates and loathes them and refuses to yield to them. They are the relics of the old nature which survive while he dwells in the flesh; but the new nature rules and does not foster them. Weeds show themselves in the best cultivated garden, but they are rooted up. When Christ saves a man from his sins, he saves him from the love of them. Thus the axe is laid to the root of the tree and the very springs of life are purified. The saved man is he who hates sin with an unrelenting hatred and seeks after holiness as his ideal life.

GERMAN AND ENGLISH C.E LEADERS.

Although Christian Endeavor is a plant of American origin, its popularity and usefuldess are not limited to American soil. From time to time we have had occasion to notice in these columns the organization and progress of societies in many lands and these not only in kindred civilizations like those in Europe, but in India, China and Japan. It is, however, among nationalities similar to our own that the chief triumphs of the movement are naturally looked for, and it is gratifying to learn how rapidly it is spreading in those directions. The three portraits on this page are those of leaders in the movement in England, in Germany and among our German speaking fellow citizens here.

Pastor Blecher is one of the most enthusiastic Christian Endeavorers in Germany. There is no man who has done so much to set the principles and advantages of the movement before the German Christian public as he. Possessing a clear, terse, sprightly style of writing, he has won the ear of the Christian community and has availed himself of his opportunity to convince his readers of the value of Christian Endeavor in promoting the interests of Christ's Kingdom. In the religious and secular press and by pamphlets and leaflets he has sounded its praises and has been the means of starting many societies in places beyond the reach of his personal visits. Pastor Blecher is the Assistant Pastor of an Evangelical Church at Bielefield.

Rev. Gottfried Berner is at the head of the Christian Endeavor movement among the Germans in this country. He is Pastor of the Friedenskirche of Buffalo, N. Y. He was born in Wurtemberg, Germany, forty-eight years ago. His early religious training was gained at Basel, Switzerland, where he was inspired with the missionary enthusiasm with which that place is associated. His earnest desire for aggressive work led him to this country, where he has labored unceasingly to bring his countrymen to Christ. It would be difficult to find a harder field for real Christian work than that of winning some classes of German immigrants who have settled here. Various causes have operated with large numbers of them, who are learned, cultured and with brilliant mental endowments, to make them more bitterly opposed to Christianity than are many natives of heathen lands. It was missionary work that Mr. Berner undertook and he entered upon it in true missionary spirit. He was soon convinced that the most hopeful part of the field was that of the young people and he set himself to gain them with earnestness. He organized a young people's society which developed into a Christian Endeavor Society and has since become the nucleus of the great German Christian Endeavor Union of North America, which is now divided into five districts with two conferences. Mr. Berner is President of this Union and is the publisher and editor of "Der Mitarbeiter," the organ of the Union. He is the author of several evangelical works one of which, entitled, "Our Young People," has done much to promote the organization of German Christian Endeavor Societies.

The third member of the group is Alderman Belsey, an Englishman, and a member of the Christian Endeavor Council of Great Britain. Mr. Belsey is a well-known worker in many circles in his own country. With an ample fortune and inexhaustible energy he is the kind of man to make an impression in any enterprise he takes up. In politics and municipal affairs, his leadership has long been acknowledged in his native town of Rochester, and he is just as prominent in religious and philanthropic movements. He is chairman of the Sunday School Union Council, and one of the most enthusiastic friends of Young Men's Christian Associations. Genial in manner, shrewd in perception, and liberal in his gifts, he has won friends everywhere, and his genius for organization has rendered him a most useful member for committees of all kinds. During a tour of this country a few years ago, he saw much of Christian Endeavor work, and on his return to England he at once took a prominent part in extending the movement there. He is now busily engaged in preparing for the great National Endeavor Convention which is shortly to be held in Birmingham.

EPWORTH LEAGUE AFFAIRS.

Preparations for the Chattanooga Conference in June next are being rapidly pushed forward. Already there are indications of such numbers being present as will surprise the whole Methodist Church, especially those members who have been speaking of the League movement as a passing enthusiasm which would soon burn itself out. How rapid is the progress being made was shown in the report Dr. Schell, the General Secretary, presented to the General Cabinet at its recent meeting in New York. He reports 14,137 regular chapters and 3,382 Juniors. This is an increase in five months of 1486 chapters of both kinds. The Junior Hymnal is now ready for publication, and the Epworth Hymnal for the regular chapters is now in an advanced stage of preparation. It is stated by those who know the character of the work that this latter book will be a surprise, as much for what it omits as for what it includes. It is an effort to make a classic hymnal free from the showy and pretentious and ephemeral both in words and music. The Cabinet spent considerable time in deciding the reading course for the ensuing year. The importance of this branch of the work is being more and more realized, and the members of the Cabinet are well aware of the fact. The West Side Chapters in New York took advantage of the presence of the Cabinent in that city to hold a demonstration. The cabinet members were corralled in the Chelsea M. E. Church, and eloquent and instructive addresses were extracted from them.

INTERNATIONAL C. E. CONVENTION.

The following interesting information received from headquarters will be useful to our readers: The coming Christian Endeavor Convention to be held in Boston, Mass., July 10-15, is arousing great enthusiasm not only in Boston and the United States, but throughout the civilized world. Already delegates are arranging to come to Boston from Australia, and prominent clergymen of Europe, who have been invited to address the convention, have accepted, so that the convention this year will be more international than any preceding convention. There is talk of our English and Irish cousins chartering a steamer to come to Boston.

An important change in the programme has been effected in that, for the first time in the history of Christian Endeavor conventions, there will be no Sunday services. This will necessitate a change from July 10-14, to July 10-15. This feature of the convention will emphasize the stand the Society has taken in regard to Sunday observance, and will avoid the necessity for Sunday travel of delegates, as many of the delegates will be quartered in Boston suburbs and would otherwise be compelled to utilize the steam and electric railways.

The programme, so far as it has yet been arranged, is to commence on Wednesday morning, July 10, with a conference of trustees and members of the United Society at Hotel Brunswick, and in the evening a number of simultaneous meetings in the churches of the city. On the following morning a general meeting to listen to the annual report will be held in Mechanics Building. Two tents have been provided to hold the overflow. Sessions in the same building and the tents will be held each morning and evening. On Friday there will be a number of conferences for the offices of the Territorial, and Provinccial Unions. On Saturday the Convention will assemble on the Common where Governor Greenhalge has promised to give an address on Good Citizenship. The Consecration meeting is to be held on Monday. Application for accommodations thus far received indicate an attendance of nearly sixty thousand delegates. The Central and Western Traffic Associations have offered the concession of one fare for the round trip.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Sunday Breakfast Association reported by C. E. Societies Wilmington, Del., reports for its first year an expenditure of $737.79, an attendance of 6928, 311 signatures to the total abstinance pledge, 31 requests for prayers and 23 confessed conversions.

The third annual International Conference of Young Women's Christian Associations held at Neuchatel, was attended by one hundred representatives from seven different countries. Work at railway stations, homes in foreign countries, employment bureaus, work in prisons and asylums were among the subjects discussed.

The Baptist Young People's Societies of California are helping in the support of Rev. W. Wynn an excellent young Scotch missionary, at Osaka, Japan. They have, last year, twenty-four societies giving for this purpose, a total of $160.36. The banner district being the Sacramento, led by Mr. D. J. Davis, President, six societies gave a total of $60.75.

A small Swiss "Societe d'Activite Chretienne" has been formed in the Chalet du Valentin, Lausanne, by the pastor M. Cornforth. It is believed this is the beginning of great things, for the steps which have led to its formation have been evidently guided by God. M. Jaccard, a minister of the Eglise Libre, has been appointed superintendent for Switzerland, and has taken up the work with much warmth.

The Examiner announces that a conference of the friends of the Baptist Young People's Union will be held at Washington next May, the day before the meeting of the Southern Baptist Convention, to consider this work in the South. It is possible that the outcome will be the formation of some kind of a Southern union, though it is hoped a way will be found to do this without impairing the larger fellowship of the International Union.

There is a flourishing Young Women's Christian Association in Calcutta. The Secretary writes: "Our evenings are full of various improvement classes. Bible study, singing, shorthand, book-keeping, dressmaking, musical drill, etc.; and from time to time there are bright Gospel and missionary meetings. We have a good tennis ground, and a very pleasant sitting-room where those who wish to rest and to meet with their friends can do so." A bookstall and registry office are in connection, also a "Travellers' Aid," so that "any girl coming to Calcutta can be met and cared for until such time as she continues her journey."

Cradles and Childhood.

ne Royal Cradles of Gold and Silver, nd others of honest Wood—The Cra- le of Jesus at Bethlehem.

"THE first cradle," says a beautiful Eastern legend, "was the arms of our mother Eve, which, with fingers interlaced and supporting her children, rocked them softly to slumber and rest." Since then, umbered mothers in all lands have cra- d their offspring in the maternal arms, in y and sorrow, in sickness and health. t even the arms of the most loving of thers grow tired at times, and she is d to be able to dispose temporarily of the le mite of humanity in some comfortable ce. To meet this want of the mother d the child, the cradle was first devised d from the earliest ages, it has been a distant and indispensable adjunct of the me in every country under the sun.

Who shall say how the first cradle look- d? It may have been simply the skin of ne animal, formed into a bag and swung m a low tree-branch; or a cradle of flex- le bark, held rudely together with thongs, d like the queer-looking affairs in which ne Indian mothers put their pappooses. any event, whatever it resembled, the decessor of our modern elegant patent ker must have been a crude construction, ough even from the earliest times, the a of securing a gentle, swaying, sooth- motion was probably kept in view. sket-cradles, round, oval-shaped, or ob- g, came into use as skill in the mechan- arts advanced. It was presumably in asket-cradle, bitumen-coated so as to ren- it impervious to water, that little Moses s placed, when he was entrusted to the der mercies of the Nile. From the bas- or bark cradle to the wooden rocker is ng reach in the history of cradles. In stern lands, the cradle used to-day by the mmon people is probably little changed m that of one or even two thousand rs ago. A Syrian baby is tightly bound vn in a cradle of roughly-cut, unpainted od, whose two ends seem not unlike bar- heads, while a pole runs across at top; little one is strapped down in a position t certainly looks uncomfortable.

n Scandinavian countries, the old-time dles were for the most part heavy, un- ldy affairs, made to do service for sev- l generations of babies. With huge rock- , deep sides and semi-circular canopies of t wood, they made very warm and snug ths for their little occupants. These ve long since been replaced by lighter and re graceful structures, and the modern dle is, in many respects a work of art. pecially is this the fact when it is select- as a gift for presentation to the parents some young princeling, as in the case of very beautiful cradle in our illustration, ich was presented recently to the infant n of the Duke and Duchess of York, the uthful heir to the throne of England. is cradle is of silver and gilt, and is ex- ite in workmanship and general finish, ng probably the finest ever seen in the ited Kingdom. There are, however, in- nces on record where cradles of pure ld have been provided for the heirs of narchs, either at their own expense or their enthusiastic subjects.

How different these costly cradles of roy- y from that humble manger-cradle in ich "The Lord of Glory" lay in a little rian town:

old on his cradle the dew-drops are shining,
Low lies his head with the beasts of the stall.

One of the monkish legends concerning rist's early infancy states that Mary adled the infant Saviour in a little man- r or crib-shaped box of sycamore wood, the same shape that is still used in stables and khans in some parts of the East. But whether the manger of Bethlehem was of wood or stone, it was none the less the grandest and yet the meanest cradle ever fashioned by human hands.

Remember Only the Pleasant Things.

We have already written at different times of the "art of forgetting" the unpleasantnesses of daily life, and what an excellent faculty it is to cultivate in the young. A lady, whose life is passed in one of our large educational institutions and who has had her share of trials was talking about her experience to her friends at home. "Are all the people at the institute so perfectly lovely?" she was asked. With a bright smile she answered: "Somehow I remember the pleasant things and forget the others." No doubt this was, in part, an acquired grace. Is it not one well worth cultivating, if only for peace of mind. A child begged for the story of Daniel one night at bed-time. "I am afraid," said the mother, "you will dream about lions." "Oh, no," returned the little one, "I will dream about Daniel, and leave out all about the lions." This little one had already learned a lesson in the art of forgetting.

Spiritual Singing.

Indifference is a foe to spiritual singing. It is not the voice that counts in spiritual singing, but the heart, and "melody unto the Lord" is not inconsistent with quavering voices and uncertain tones. Some people trying because they fear to create discord. But better discord to the ear than silence in think they cannot sing, and refrain from the soul; songs of praise may have false tones in them when they rise, but if they are from true and loyal hearts they will have harmony enough when they reach heaven's choir, and the angels of God take up the strain. Bad manners will kill spiritual singing. There are people who would not dream of talking while the preacher prays, but they have no scruple if the prayer be set to music. In an average congregation the discords will be utterly drowned out—if everybody sings. Four people out of five can sing correctly, if they will, the grand yet simple melodies. And in any event, hearty uncultured congregational singing is better than concordant operatic quartettes in the house of God.

Marrying Rich.

The time is coming when, with the spread of Christian principles, riches will no longer be regarded as worthy of honor and respect in themselves, but rather as a possible incubus, unless the possessor is one whose life and actions are governed by the noblest deeds and purposes. In the present condition of society, unequal matches—where one is wealthy and the other comparatively poor—usually prove a vexation. Apropos of such experiences, a writer in "Scribner's Magazine" has this amusing paragraph, which shows "the other side" of the usual unequal match: "My cousin Anthony has been in to tell me of the betrothal of his son to a young woman of exceptionally voluminous financial prospects. My cousin is not himself a man of large means, and his children's fortunes are still to be made; nevertheless it was not without an air of deprecation and symptoms of uneasiness that he told me what his son had done, But, I said, seeing Anthony growing solemn, somebody must marry the rich girls. There might be enough rich young men to pair off with them if all the rich bachelors were available; but as long as a large percentage of the rich bachelors insist on marrying poor girls there is no choice but for some rich girls to marry poor men or none. And, after all, if a girl is truly a nice girl, it would be a shame to avoid her because of her fortune. I think I was a comfort to cousin Anthony. He went away looking a good deal less dejected than when he came in."

ANOTHER DAY.

ANOTHER closing day,
Another setting sun,—
What progress have I made?
What duty have I done?

Amid perplexing cares
That marked this checkered life,
O have I sought thy grace
To help me in the strife?

Have I, in simple faith
Before thy gracious throne,
Lived only in thy strength,
Nor trusted in my own?

Dear Saviour, guide my feet
In all the toilsome way,
And bring me nearer thee
With each declining day.

SOCIAL DEGRADATION IN SIAM.

IN a recent article by the late Wm. M. Taylor, D.D., this striking picture is given of the degraded social and religious conditions of life in Japan at the present time: Like the Chinese, the Siamese have a passion for gambling. Gambling houses are established in different parts of Bangkok, and are open at all hours. Near mid-day, we visited one of these institutions and found it crowded with scores of men, and mingled with them were numbers of women and young people. Shells, cards and coins were used.

The gambling spirit is so rife that they resort to all sorts of schemes to indulge it. They will put two fishes of a certain kind in glass globes quite near each other; when they see the fighting propensities of the fishes are properly aroused, they will then put them together in the same globe and let them fight it out. The owner of the victorious fish gets the stake. Dr. McFarland, who taught the boys' school for the government, says he has known the boys to bring crickets to school in their pockets, that they might enjoy the prize fight between the chirpers during play time. Mrs. Eaken repeated to me the prayer of her little boy the night after I visited them: "Lord, bless father, mother, sister, and Mr. Taylor, and the bad men who fight roosters!"

The practice of chewing the betel nut is common with both men and women. The tobacco habit is bad enough, but this is far worse. A certain spicy leaf, a little quicklime, and often some tobacco are used with the betel nut. The effect of this mongrel mouthful is to blacken the teeth, add large concretions to them in the course of time, and to thicken and protrude the discolored lower lip in a most disgusting manner. Dr. George McFarland showed me in his dental rooms teeth as black as coal.

A Hundred Years Hence.

Every family has its heirlooms, priceless treasures that in themselves do not represent a very great money value, but what a world of reminiscence they unfold of early struggles. A descendent of the Pilgrim Fathers has an old rusty flint-lock, perhaps, or a faded cockade, that tells of heroism; that recalls the Declaration of Independence; heroism that gave to the whole world an asylum for the oppressed, a haven that has gathered to its shores people from every clime and speaking every tongue.

Every town and hamlet has its survivors of a gigantic struggle that shattered the manacles of slavery, and many a widow robbed of her life-partner by the cruel ravages of war, holds a wrinkled envelope that came from the field of battle, telling of the onward march to victory. Here a battered drum and there a flag shot to shreds. Sometimes an old clock ticks away to recall the old homestead of pioneer days, and there are none of us who do not possess an heirloom of some sort.

The crowning glory of the closing century, the World's Fair, afforded an opportunity to many families to secure souvenirs, little things that delight the eye, to be left behind when we have done with this life, and in time become heirlooms that money cannot purchase, for they are of historical value.

The daintiest souvenir of the Fair one can have is the Souvenir Spoon. They show the World's Fair Buildings, with the head of Columbus and dates 1492-1893, and a hundred years from now will tell the story of the marvelous peace offering to the world that closed the Nineteenth Century. For 99c. the Leonard Mfg. Co., 20 Adams Street, Chicago, will send you a set of six different spoons, with solid gold plated bowls, each one showing a different building of the Fair, the same that your neighbor paid nine dollars for on the Fair grounds. This is certainly a glorious opportunity, and you cannot afford to miss it. See their advertisement on the back cover of this issue.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

THE AUTHOR OF OUR NEW SERIAL.

MR. EDWARD CARSWELL, the author of our new Serial Story, is a writer of brilliant ability, and with a wide reputation as an orator, poet, artist and author. He is known everywhere as a forcible and argumentative teacher, and no more eloquent speaker has occupied the temperance platform since the days of John B. Gough. He has lectured in nearly every state in the Union and Canada, and has delivered forty-seven addresses at Ocean Grove to great audiences. Among his best known books are, "Let it Alone," a moral story which instantly achieved a national success. He is now in middle-life, but in the prime of his intellectual powers, and capable of teaching the noblest lessons with his pen, as "Alice Mapleton's Ordeal" will demonstrate to our readers.

Mr. Carswell, whose portrait appears in the medallion in the above heading, has his home at Oshawa, Ont., Canada. He was born at Ware, England, in 1831, and came to Canada with his parents in 1835, settling in Toronto, Can. He spent several years in the far west, and returned to Toronto and afterwards went to Oshawa, where he soon became actively identified with the Sons of Temperance—an organization of which he is still an honored member, and in which he has held various high offices. Mr. Carwell's family consists of his wife, two sons and three daughters. Much of his long life-work in the temperance cause has been performed under the auspices of the National Temperance Society.

CHAPTER I.

Mother and Daughter.

NOW, mother, do not cry any more. You look better this morning and if you will try and forget the past, if only for a little while, it will do you so much good; things might be worse than they are."

"Yes, my child I know all the old sayings, how often have I quoted them to others, in my days of happiness and prosperity, now they sound like empty words without meaning. "Oh, yes! I remember them all: 'Every cloud has a silver lining.' 'It is always darkest before daybreak.' 'It is never so bad, but what it might be worse.' 'No lane but has a turning at last.' There is no truth in any of them as far as we are concerned, things could not possibly be any worse. I have lost all faith and hope, and can see no refuge beyond, save the grave. Who could have believed that so much pain and sorrow could be crowded into two short years? Only two years ago, wealth, a loving husband, a dear boy who was my idol, a beautiful home, hosts of friends, everything that heart could wish for, and all gone in two short years; friends, happiness, fortune, and the dear ones; all gone all gone!"

"Oh! do not say all, mother," and the fair young girl dropped upon her knees beside her mother's bed, and burying her face in the coverlet, burst into tears.

"No, no, God forgive me," said the startled mother, as she laid her thin, white hand on the golden-brown head of the girl, "I was thinking of the ones taken, and not the dear one left. What should I do without you? You have done everything that a brave, loving child could do for a poor helpless mother, who has lost pride, health and courage. Yes, I have something to be thankful for, in that you are spared to me; but you must forgive your poor sick mother, for my heart is broken."

"No; it was I who was to blame for showing my weakness," said Alice as she arranged the pillow and kissed her mother; "Now, you will take a little toast and tea and then you must let me help you into your chair, and after I have made up your bed, I will answer an advertisement I saw in the paper yesterday: A lady wants a person to teach drawing to three young ladies, and to give the lessons at their homes."

Mr. Mapleton had been a successful merchant, and was supposed to be very wealthy. He had worked his way up from being a poor clerk in a country store. His wife, on the other hand, had never known a want unsatisfied in her life, for her parents although not rich, had made her (their only child), their idol, and had lavished on her all their love and money. She was a kind-hearted woman, a loving wife and affectionate mother, but proud of her position in society, and very proud of her children; and the latter was not to be wondered at, for they were children to be proud of. Alice was not only gentle, affectionate and accomplished, but also a very beautiful girl; and Will, was a young man without any bad habits, industrious at college, leader, not only in most of the classes, but in all the manly sports; he was a dutiful and affectionate son, and was very proud of his sister.

Alice had many suitors, indeed their name was legion; she was kind and gentle to all, but firm and decided, when any of them went beyond the words of friendship, or ventured a proposal of marriage. The fact was Alice had a secret hidden away in her own heart, she loved and was beloved by one whom she knew would be objectionable to her family on account of his poverty.

Fred Morgan was a clerk in her father's store; he was the son of a hard-working but poor farmer; he was a great strapping fellow, full of life and sunshine, and had shown great energy and ambition in securing his education, and in working his way from the plough to his present position, which was a responsible one in the great firm: but altho' a handsome fellow in form and feature, and a gentleman in life and action, he could not be admitted to the same circle in society to which the Mapletons belonged. It was at a picnic that he first met Alice, and it was a case of love at first sight, it was astonishing how often they met accidentally after that; that summer he managed to spend his two weeks' holiday at or near (for he was camping), the same watering-place where the Mapletons had their cottage. How many strolls along the beach, or how many boat-rides they had together, can hardly be numbered. But one moonlight evening they happened to meet on the long board walk by the beach. Both feeling tired, they seated themselves on a rustic bench; they were alone; for a popular entertainment was taking place at the Auditorium, and they seemed to be the only two who had lost interest in the performance, and had slipped away and met, as we see, by accident. They sat for some time silently looking out over the moonlit water, then with almost a sob, Fred said:

"Oh, Miss Alice, what shall I do?"

"About what, Fred?" she asked in a voice scarcely above a whisper.

"I have called myself all the hard names I could think of for my presumption; I feel how hopeless is my case; I have sworn that I would never mention it to you;" he took her hand which she did not withdraw, but still she looked out over the water—"I have determined over and over again to go away and keep my secret and suffering to myself, but I have never had the courage."

"I am glad of that," she whispered.

With a thrill of joy, Fred caught her other hand, "From the first moment I saw you," he exclaimed, "I have loved you as I never thought it possible for one being to love another, and I have struggled but hopelessly to break the chain until I find I must speak or go mad—tell me is there any hope, not now, but in the future?"

She turned her face to his, tears were on the long lashes of her great pansy-like eyes, and she said, "Fred, you know that I love you."

Fred caught her in his arms and her head lay trustingly on his breast as she went on: "I fear I am doing wrong, and saying what I should not say, but I cannot help it any more than you can; I love you better than anyone in this world, and shall until I die."

"You blessed darling!" said Fred as he kissed her again and again. Come what will in the future, sorrow, misfortune, suffering, this moment's happiness will more that compensate for all I can suffer in a lifetime. Now I can go out into the world and win my way to fortune with the strength of ten men, for the fight will be for you. And now, dear, what shall I do? Shall I ask your father's consent, or shall we keep it to ourselves for a time? I feel sure that your family will be shocked, and refuse their consent."

"I fear that mamma will be very much opposed to our love," said Alice, "because she does not know you, and has very ambitious notions as to my future, so perhaps we had better keep our own secret for a time."

"I fear," said Fred, "that one besides ourselves has a suspicion and is on the watch. I mean your father's partner, Mr. Jackson. He has changed very much in his conduct towards me of late; he has become more exacting and severe, and at times almost insulting. He has hinted several times in my presence that you and he were engaged."

"How dare he!" cried Alice. "I have twice refused him; and I know no other man for whom I feel so strong a dislike. I feel that he is deceitful and underhanded, and I wonder how father could ever have trusted, or taken such a person for a partner."

"I have wondered at your father's confidence in the man, myself; for if I am a judge of human nature, he is a selfish, unscrupulous man, who would not stand at anything, no matter how dishonorable, to gain his end. But we must not spend the few minutes we have together talking on such a disagreeable subject."

For an hour, hand in hand they sauntered up and down the beach, forming plans that never could be carried out, building impossible castles in the air, forgetting, for the time, that there was any other world outside that moon-lit stretch of sand, or other people save themselves to inhabit it. They were startled from their dream by the church bell striking ten.

When Alice returned to the cottage she was anxious to get to her room without meeting anyone, for she doubted her power to hide the great joy that filled her heart, and well she might, for her eyes sparkled like diamonds, her cheeks were aglow, and her heart seemed dancing within her."

But her mother met her at the door. "I have been waiting for you, Alice," she said in a constrained voice. "Was not that Fred Morgan who left you at the gate?"

"Yes, mamma, he met me on the beach, and it was such a lovely night, and the heat was so oppressive in the hall that I felt faint and came away, and was glad when I met Fred, for I have had a lovely walk."

"Alice, I am astonished at you, to be seen promenading with one of your father's clerks, and a nobody at that, and at this hour of the night too, and when I returned I found this note under the door without a signature. I will read it to you, then you will not wonder at my agitation:"

MRS. MAPLETON:—You had better keep a watch on your daughter Alice, as she is being deceived by a low-down, money-hunting villain; and the quicker Mr. Mapleton discharges a certain sneaking clerk now in his employ, the better for the happiness of your daughter. ONE WHO HAS EYES AND HAS SEEN.

Alice was struck dumb for a moment; she stood pale and speechless.

"What do you think of that?" asked Mrs. Mapleton, as she folded the note and sank into a chair; then the white face of Alice changed to a scarlet, and a whirlwind of indignation shook her from head to foot. "What do I think of it? Why, I think (and she faced her mother) that the mean creature who wrote it and was ashamed to sign his name, is beneath contempt. And if he refers to Fred Morgan in that letter, I should like to tell him to his face that there is more of the true gentleman in one of Fred's little fingers than could be found in a whole regiment of such cowards as the writer of that note. And mother, I am astonished that you should speak so slightingly of Fred. He may be poor, but he is a true gentleman, and any girl might be proud of his friendship, and be perfectly safe in his society."

Alice felt that she had allowed her indignation and her love to carry her too far, so she stopped short, while Mrs. Mapleton sat as if paralyzed. She had never heard anything like this from sweet tempered, gentle Alice before. She sat for a moment with her eyes fixed with astonishment on her daughter. She was very pale and her features were drawn and hard. Then she slowly arose and said in a decided tone of voice

"We will return to the city in the morning," and she marched out of the room without saying good night.

"Good-night, mamma," said Alice. "I shall be all ready to morrow." She did not add how much she wanted to return to the city on the morrow, because if she had, she would have had to confess that Fred, also had to return the next day.

CHAPTER II.

Employer and Clerk.

The next afternoon when Fred entered the office he could perceive that something was wrong; the clerks only gave him a sid glance; Mr. Mapleton instead of meeting him in his former hearty way with a sla on the back and a shake of the hand, sat a his desk with his head bowed and merel nodded as Fred entered. Mr. Jackson la back in his chair with a half grin and ha sneer upon his face. "You need not go t your books," said Mr. Jackson, "as w have no more need of your services."

"What do you mean?" asked Fred i astonishment.

"That you are discharged," said Jackso

"Will you please give me some explana tion?" asked Fred turning to Mr. Mapleto

"You have been found out, that's all, said Jackson, "and you will please lea the office."

"I was not speaking to you, sir; I wa addressing the gentleman who engage me," said Fred.

"Yes, Fred, you are right; you shou have some explanation. They tell me thing are not right, your books and other thing you know," said Mr. Mapleton.

"If you doubt my honesty, sir, I certai ly shall remain until I clear myself or a proved dishonest."

"Well, Fred, to tell the truth, I nev doubted your honesty; I do not now; the may be some mistake, but you have act badly by me and mine; I refer to my daug ter. You have taken advantage of our kin ness and confidence, and, and, my wife so angry with you that she is now sick her bed."

"I am very sorry to hear it, sir; but what way have I been dishonorable?"

"Well—well, I don't know. I ha thought almost as much of you as if y were my son, and you have deceived me

"No, sir," said Fred, "there is deceptio you are being deceived, but you are loo ing in the wrong direction to discover it."

Here Jackson broke in (there were on the three in the office), "Mapleton, how c you listen to such a contemptible pupp Have I not shown you enough to prove I dishonesty?"

"Yes, by the bye, Fred, Mr. Jacks pointed out one dishonest record or mista in your books. Perry & Co. paid you $2 the day before you left, and you have on given credit for $50."

"You must ask Mr. Jackson about th item," said Fred, "as he took the mon and gave the receipt. It happened while was at lunch, and when I saw the credit my book, I became a little suspicious, s took the trouble to call on Perry & Co., a have the written statement that the mon was paid to Mr. Jackson."

Mr. Jackson's face had turned first ve white, and then a fiery red; he was glari at Fred like an enraged animal. He spra to his feet. "Do you mean to say, sir, t I have falsified your books?" he asked.

"That is what it looks like to me," plied Fred, with the most provoking co ness.

"Do you know that you are talking t gentleman, sir?"

"No, I do not," said Fred in the sa tone.

"I have a great mind to call a policema and have you arrested on the spot," sa Jackson.

"I don't think you would dare risk su a thing, although I have no objectio however, and I think it would be a go thing for Mr. Mapleton, but I should engage your brother as my lawyer, as y have persuaded this firm to do," said Fr

"Leave this office, sir! You are a sne and a villain," and fairly boiling with p sion he strode over to where Fred w standing and glared at the young man w clenched fist and flaming eyes.

MYRIADS OF SHINTO GODS.

Writing of the native religions of Japan, W. Elliott Griffis, D.D., says: "If a multitud of gods could have obviated the tendency on the part of each individual to have something for his own particular worship, one would suppose that Shinto fulfilled all requirements. One of its prayers attests the existence of eight hundred myriads of celestial gods, fifteen hundred myriads of terrile gods, and alludes to others whom it does not enumerate. The reader who has the curiosity to add these vague numbers together will find that Shinto accommodates its votaries with more than a god apiece. But their influence is all so uniform that it is supposed to be concentrated by any worshiper with fervent prayer to the aid of those images and divine symbols which he keeps upon a shelf in his own house. The natural disposition was to practise what one Shinto commentator directly enjoined—to worship by name only the most important as to include the rest in a general petition. From the moment it was imagined that this could be done, a classification began among the supernatural powers exactly similar to that which accompanied the growth of feudalism among men. If there were gods who served, there must be others who ruled all the way up to some one deity over all."

The Nervous Man

is very much in evidence in these days. The nervous woman should not always monopolize the advertisements. Great difference of opinion exists as to the best treatment for both. Some say they need "a good talking to," others "a change of scene," others "something to occupy the mind," but what the nervous person really needs is wholesome food which he or she can digest, for the nervous man is always an improperly nourished man, and nervousness generally begins with inability to digest food. It is therefore very important that all Should Know About Cottolene.

If food is cooked with this new vegetable product instead of lard, a change will be seen and before long the nervous man will be found to eat well, digest well, sleep well and act well. This is not theory—it is history, and the cook for nervous men and women may benefit them with Cottolene.

It is sold everywhere in one, three and five pound tins, with the trade mark—steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every package.

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication, but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate health, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Inflammations; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be true yours. It can be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

COME TO THE CROSS.

CHRIST, the Lord, has died for you
Sinner, died for even you
Come to the Cross where there is light,
Come to the Cross and receive your sight,
Come to the Cross of Jesus.

Lo, the Saviour, Son of God
Dare you walk where he has trod?
Come to the Cross, do not delay,
Come to the Cross! Why not to-day?
Come to the Cross of Jesus.

Streams of love their fulness bring
From the fountains of the King.
Come to the Cross where joys await,
Come, before it is too late!
Come to the Cross of Jesus

Count those days as lost, that bring
You no nearer to your King.
Come to the Cross without one plea;
Come in your humility.
Come to the Cross of Jesus.

Will you crucify your Lord
Even by thought and deed and word?
Come to the Cross where there is light,
Come to the Cross and receive your sight,
Come to the Cross of Jesus

with the oxygen of the air as fuel. Rightly used, the fuel never fails. But our present day fever-heat style of living is not right use. It's ABUSE. Of course, our feeders (the lungs) can't keep pace, and — we burn out.

For this abnormal demand Electropoise creates an extra supply. It opens every pore in our bodies and lets us appropriate the oxygen we so much need.

When vitality is low more fuel is needed to stimulate the burning of the fire of health. When there's a fever the extra oxygen is just as much needed for fuel so that the fever may not consume the tissues. It is on this general principle that the Electropoise is such a universal help in all sorts of disorders.

Please note what a contrast there is between these two letters, one written in '93, and the other in '94. Also note the different diseases treated. There are many more such that could be cited and we should be glad to give any one information in plenty.

ENFIELD, Ill., Dec. 11, 1893.

Gentlemen: I inclose New York draft to pay for your pocket Electropoise. I do not often bite so quick at new things, but your theory seems sensible, and your list of testimonials makes a very strong showing as to results.

I presume your book of directions will be minute and easily understood, and cover a variety of cases.

My wife is so low I hardly expect a cure for her, but my daughter has had a nervous breakdown and is troubled with insomnia and constipation

I suppose everything that is needed will accompany the instrument. If you send by express we have Adams Express here.

TRADE MARK.

Willis Bros., Bankers.

(Second Letter).

ENFIELD, Ill., May 14, 1894.

I am glad of an opportunity to speak a word for the Electropoise. We began using it in December, 1893. At that time my daughter was suffering from a second nervous breakdown, for which she had been under treatment for about eighteen months. When we began to use the Electropoise she was in a very distressed condition of mind and suffered much from insomnia. After a few day's treatment she brightened up and natural sleep returned. She is now doing light housework, reading, playing the piano and goes about the place with her old-time vigor and cheerfulness. We feared that she might never fully recover, but now are confident that she will.

We have also used the Electropoise in the case of my wife, who has been down with nervous prostration for the past thirteen months. When we began to use the Electropoise she had been pronounced incurable by two good physicians. Her condition is now very much improved, and while the treatment is necessarily mild and the results slow, I believe the use of the Electropoise will result in her full recovery.

The Healing of the Waters.

Elisha's Fountain Near Jericho and the Wondrous Miracle that was wrought There —The Living Stream Still a Blessing to the Plain.

NEARLY twenty-eight hundred years ago, a strange scene was enacted beside the picturesque little stream shown in the photograph below. Flowing in the midst of a barren plain, with no other water nearer than the river Jordan, the stream might reasonably have been regarded as a source of fruitfulness and blessing; but, through a strange and unnatural perversion, it had become a baleful and blasting influence instead. It flowed near the ancient city of Jericho, whose inhabitants had come to regard its presence as a blight on the plain and a menace to their own welfare. Its noxious waters, foul-smelling and evil-tasting, poisoned the ground along its course and killed all vegetation, besides causing the death of any children or cattle who might come to it, and spreading a sickly influence over all that part of the country through which it flowed.

To the banks of this maleficent stream came one day the prophet of the Lord, Elisha. Only a short time before, he had seen his great prophet-teacher, Elijah, ascend to heaven and had been invested with the mantle of his predecessor in token that he was to possess the spirit of Elijah and to continue his work. The Jordan had miraculously parted to permit his passage to the western side, and he had then proceeded to Jericho, where he tarried while the sons of the prophets made vain search for the departed Elijah. It was while Elisha rested at Jericho that the men of the city, discerning in him a true prophet, laid before him their complaint concerning the barren, death-dealing fountain or stream, and he listened attentively. He asked that they should bring him a new cruse or earthen vessel and that it be filled with salt. When this was done, the prophet, accompanied by the men of the place, "went forth unto the spring of the waters" (II. Kings 2:21), or the place where the stream issues from the rocky soil, and there he cast in the salt, and in the name of the Lord, declared the waters healed, and that there should not "be from thence any more death or barren land." Josephus relates that Elisha, after throwing the salt into the current, "poured out a mild drink-offering, and this supplication that the current might be mollified and that the veins of fresh water might be opened; that God also would bring into the place a more temperate and fertile air for the current, and would bestow upon the people of that country plenty of the fruits of the earth and a succession of children, and that this prolific water might never fail them while they continued to be righteous' . . . And the water, which had been the occasion of barrenness and famine before, from that time did supply a numerous posterity, and afford great abundance to the country. Accordingly," adds the Jewish historian, "the power of it is so great in watering the ground that if it does but once touch a country, it affords a sweeter nourishment than other waters do." And thus, under Divine permission, the miracle was accomplished, and the waters were healed even "unto this day," as the Scripture affirmed, for recent travelers all unite in the statement that no sweeter, cleaner, or more refreshing draught is to be found in the streams of Palestine than can be dipped up from "Elisha's Fountain." It has a perennial and abundant flow, and it waters more ground than do many greater streams, affording nourishment to countless fields, many beautiful gardens and groves of palm-trees. From being barren waste the ground has become exceedingly fertile, and the numerous irrigating rills water the soil and assist in producing good crops of beans, barley, wheat, and other cereals. The springs of the fountain empty into a large reservoir or basin, which expands into a lakelet upon whose palm-shaded banks the traveler may rest. In other years the neighborhood was a favorite haunt of the Bedouins, whose wearied horses would plunge into the pool until its cooling waters reached over their knees, while their masters sat by the shaded margin enjoying a frugal repast, and drinking from the clear and sparkling waters that rippled past them to the Jordan. Nearby are the pillars of ruined aqueducts, the fragments of masonry and hewn stones cropping up through the soil, with here and there a perfect pyramid of debris—all marking the ruins of the once populous and powerful city of Jericho, which was described as "huge and high-towered" in the time of Joshua.

"ELISHA'S FOUNTAIN," NEAR JERICHO, PALESTINE.

From a photograph recently secured in the Holy Land by the Proprietor of "The Christian Herald."

Palestine abounds in fountains. Its landscapes are dotted with springs, brooks and rivulets, many of whose names have been historic; yet, as a rule they are short-lived, though remarkable for their beauty. Their importance and the high appreciation with which they are regarded, are both due to the fact that "living water" in the Orient has been held to be one of the best gifts bestowed upon man. Many of the fountains are prominently associated with important events in Bible history. Philip's Fountain on the road to Gaza, where the evangelist baptized the trusted servant of Queen Candace; the Apostles Fountain, on the Jericho road, whose crystalline invitation still attracts the thirsty traveler along that highway; the "Fountain of the Virgin" at Nazareth, to which Mary may often have come with the other women of the village to draw water; the fountain or springs of the Brook Cherith, by the margin of which Elijah was fed by the ravens; the Fountain and Pool of Siloam of healing memory, and the fountains of the Jordan at Dan and Banias, and of the Abana at Fijeh and Zebedany. In that land of mountains and valleys and rocky gorges, the low murmur of fountains is a frequent and welcome sound, and their water-courses are marked by luxuriant vegetation and beautiful foliage. The presence of a fountain is a perpetual delight to all who dwell near it, and the appreciation of the "living waters" is all the more marked when, in the midst of some unusually dry season, the stream that has made a garden of its surroundings becomes parched and dried up and even its springs fail at the fountain-head.

"Elisha's Fountain," and its shaded banks and verdurous fields adjacent, are a pleasant and striking contrast to the arid and stony character of the country round about. The road between Jerusalem and Jericho leads for fifteen miles through a dreary wilderness with only a single refreshing spot after leaving the course of the fountain, and travelers are exposed to the parching rays of the Syrian sun, which beat down upon them with almost tropical fierceness. In the Bible the fountain is a symbol of physical refreshment and spiritual blessing, being a type of the abundant comforts which the Lord bestows upon his people.

WHOLESALE DIVORCE.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached last Sunday in the Academy of Music, N.Y.

Text: Matt. 19: 6, "What therefore God hath joined together let not man put asunder."

THAT there are hundreds and thousands of infelicitous homes in America no one will doubt. If there were only one skeleton in the closet, that might be locked up and abandoned; but in many a home there is a skeleton in the hallway and a skeleton in all the apartments.

"Unhappily married" are two words descriptive of many a homestead. It needs no orthodox minister to prove to a badly-mated pair that there is a hell; they are there now. Sometimes a grand and gracious woman will be thus incarcerated, and her life will be a crucifixion, as was the case with Mrs. Sigourney, the great poetess and the great soul. Sometimes a consecrated man will be united to a fury, as was John Wesley, or united to a vixen, as was John Milton. Sometimes, and generally, both parties are to blame, and Thomas Carlyle was an intolerable scold, and his wife smoked and swore; and Froude, the historian, pulled aside the curtain from the lifelong squabble at Craigenputtock and Five, Cheyne Row.

Some say that for the alleviation of all these domestic disorders of which we hear, easy divorce is a good prescription. God sometimes authorizes divorce as certainly as he authorizes marriage. I have just as much regard for one lawfully divorced as I have for one lawfully married. But you know and I know that wholesale divorce is one of our national scourges. I am not surprised at this when I think of the influences which have been abroad militating against the marriage relation.

For many years the platforms of the country rang with talk about a free-love millennium. There were meetings of this kind held in the Cooper Institute, New York; Tremont Temple, Boston, and all over the land. Some of the women who were most prominent in that movement have since been distinguished for great promiscuosity of affection. Popular themes for such occasions were the tyranny of man, the oppression of the marriage relation, women's rights, and the affinities. Prominent speakers were women with short curls and short dress and very long tongue, everlastingly at war with God because they were created women; while on the platform sat meek men with soft accent and cowed demeanor, apologetic for masculinity, and holding the parasols while the termagant orators went on preaching the doctrine of free love.

That campaign of about twenty years set more devils into the marriage relation than will be exorcised in the next fifty. Men and women went home from such meetings so permanently confused as to who were their wives and husbands that they never got out of their perplexity, and the criminal and the civil courts tried to disentangle the Iliad of woes, and this one got alimony, and that one got a limited divorce, and this mother kept the children on condition that the father could sometimes come and look at them, and these went into poorhouses, and those went into an insane asylum, and those went into dissolute public life, and all went to destruction. The mightiest war ever made against the marriage institution was that free-love campaign, sometimes under one name and sometimes under another.

Another influence that has warred upon the marriage relation has been polygamy in Utah. That was a stereotyped caricature of the marriage relation, and has poisoned the whole land. You might as well think that you can have an arm in a state of mortification and yet the whole body not be sickened, as to have those territories polygamized, and yet the body of the nation not feel the putrefaction. Hear it, good men and women of America, that so long ago as 1862 a law was passed by Congress forbidding polygamy in the territories and in all the places where they had jurisdiction. Twenty-four years passed along and five administrations before the first brick was knocked from that fortress of libertinism.

Every new President in his inaugural tickled that monster with the straw of condemnation, and every Congress stultified itself in proposing some plan that would not work. Polygamy stood more entrenched, and more brazen, and more puissant, and more braggart, and more infernal. James Buchanan, a much abused man of his day, did more for the extirpation of this villainy than most of the subsequent administrations. Mr. Buchanan sent out an army, and although it was halted in its work, still he accomplished more than some of the administrations which did nothing but talk, talk, talk! At last, but not until it had poisoned generations, polygamy has received its death-blow.

Polygamy in Utah warred against the marriage relation throughout the land. It was impossible to have such an awful sewer of iniquity sending up its miasma, which was wafted by the winds north, south, east, and west, without the whole land being affected by it.

Another influence that has warred against the marriage relation in this country has been a pustulous literature, with its millions of sheets every week choked with stories of domestic wrongs, and infidelities, and massacres, and outrages, until it is a wonder to me that there are any decencies, or any common-sense left on the subject of marriage. One-half of the news-stands of all our cities reeking with the filth.

"Now," say some, "we admit all these evils, and the only way to clear them out or correct them is by easy divorce." Well, before we yield to that cry, let us find out how easy it is now.

I have looked over the laws of all the States, and I find that while in some States it is easier than in others, in every State it is easy. The State of Illinois, through its legislature, recites a long list of proper causes for divorce, and then closes up by giving to the courts the right to make a decree of divorce in any case where they deem it expedient. After that you are not surprised at the announcement that in one county of the State of Illinois, in one year, there were eight hundred and thirty-three divorces. If you want to know how easy it is, you have only to look over the records of the States. In the city of San Francisco three hundred and thirty-three divorces in one year; and in twenty years in New England twenty thousand. Is that not easy enough?

If the same ratio continue—the ratio of multiplied divorce and multiplied causes of divorce—we are not far from the time when our courts will have to set apart whole days for application, and all you will have to prove against a man will be that he left his newspaper in the middle of the floor, and all you will have to prove against a woman will be that her husband's overcoat is buttonless. Causes of divorce doubled in a few years—doubled in France, doubled in England, and doubled in the United States. To show how very easy it is, I have to tell you that in Western Reserve, Ohio, the proportion of divorces to marriages celebrated is one to eleven; in Rhode Island is one to thirteen; in Vermont one to fourteen. Is not that easy enough?

I want you to notice that frequency of divorce always goes along with the dissoluteness of society. Rome for five hundred years had not one case of divorce. Those were her days of glory and virtue. Then the reign of vice began, and divorce became epidemic. If you want to know how rapidly the Empire went down, ask Gibbon.

What we want in this country and in all lands is that divorce be made more and more and more difficult. Then people before they enter that relation will be persuaded that there will probably be no escape from it except through the door of the sepulchre. Then they will pause on the verge of that relation until they are fully satisfied that it is best, and that it is right, and that it is happiest. Then we shall have no more marriage in fun. Then men and women will not enter the relation with the idea it is only a trial trip, and if they do not like it they can get out at the first landing Then this whole question will be taken out of the frivolous into the tremendous, and there will be no more joking about the blossoms in a bride's hair than about the cypress on a coffin.

What we want is that the Congress of the United States change the national Constitution so that a law can be passed which shall be uniform all over the country, and what shall be right in one State shall be right in all the States, and what is wrong in one State will be wrong in all the States.

How is it now? If a party in the marriage relation gets dissatisfied, it is only necessary to move to another State to achieve liberation from the domestic tie, and divorce is effected so easy that the first one party knows of it is by seeing in the newspaper that Rev. Dr. Somebody on March 17, 1895, introduced in a new marriage relation a member of the household who went off on a pleasure excursion to Newport or a business excursion to Chicago. Married at the bride's house. No cards. There are States of the Union which practically put a premium upon the disintegration of the marriage relation, while there are other States, like our own New York State, that had for a long time the pre-eminent idiocy of making marriage lawful at twelve and fourteen years of age.

The Congress of the United States needs to move for a change of the national Constitution, and then to appoint a committee—not made up of single gentlemen, but of men of families, and their families in Washington—who shall prepare a good, honest, righteous, comprehensive, uniform law that will control everything from Sandy Hook to the Golden Horn. That will put an end to brokerages in marriages. That will send divorce lawyers into a decent business. That will set people agitated for many years on the question of how shall they get away from each other to planning how they can adjust themselves to the more or less unfavorable circumstances.

More difficult divorce will put an estoppel to a great extent upon marriage as a financial speculation. There are men who go into the relation just as they go into Wall Street to purchase shares. The female to be invited into the partnership of wedlock is utterly unattractive, and in disposition a suppressed Vesuvius. Everybody knows it, but this masculine candidate for matrimonial orders, through the commercial agency or through the county records, finds out how much estate is to be inherited, and he calculates it. He thinks out how long it will be before the old man will die, and whether he can stand the refractory tempe until he does die, and then he enters the re lation; for he says: "If I cannot stand it then through the divorce law I'll back out. That process is going on all the time, an men enter the relation without any mor principle, without any affection, and it is a much a matter of stock speculation as any thing that transpired yesterday in Unio Pacific, Illinois Central or Delaware an Lackawanna.

Now, suppose a man understood, as I ought to understand, that if he goes in that relation there is no possibility of h getting out, or no probability, he would l more slow to put his neck in the yoke. H would say to himself: "Rather than a Ca ibbean whirlwind with a whole fleet shipping in its arms, give me a zephyr fields of sunshine and gardens of peace."

Rigorous divorce law will also hind women from the fatal mistake of marr ing men to reform them. If a young m by twenty-five years of age or thirty yea of age have the habit of strong drink fix on him, he is as certainly bound for drunkard's grave as that a train starti out from Grand Central Depot at eig o'clock to-morrow morning is bound Albany. The train may not reach Alba for it may be thrown from the track. T young man may not reach a drunkar grave, for something may throw him the iron track of evil habit; but the prob bility is that the train that starts to-morr morning at eight o'clock for Albany w get there, and the probability is that young man who has the habit of stro drink fixed on him before twenty-five thirty years of age will arrive at a drur ard's grave. She knows he drinks, though he tries to hide it by chewi cloves. Everybody knows he drink Parents warn, neighbors and friends wa She will marry him, she will reform him

In one case out of ten th sand it may be a successful experime I never saw the successful experiment. have a rigorous divorce law, and that w an will say: "If I am affianced to that m it is for life."

A rigorous divorce law will also do m to hinder hasty and inconsiderate marria Under the impression that one can be ea released, people enter the relation wit inquiry and without reflection. Roma e and impulse rule the day. Perhaps only ground for the marriage compac that she likes his looks and he admires graceful way she passes around the cream at the picnic! It is all they kn about each other. It is all the prepara for life. A woman that could not mak a loaf of bread to save her life will swea cherish and obey. A Christian will m an atheist, and that always makes conj ed wretchedness; for if a man does no lieve there is a God, he is neither to be t ed with a dollar nor with your lifelong h piness. Having read much about love a cottage, people brought up in ease wil and starve in a hovel.

By the wreck of ten thousand hom by the holocaust of ten thousand sacri men and women, by the hearth-ston the family which is the corner-stone of State, and in the name of that God hath set up the family institution and hath made the breaking of the marital th the most appalling of all perjuries, I impre the Congress of the United States to m some righteous, uniform law for all States and from ocean to ocean, on subject of marriage and divorce.

OUT OF THE MIRE.

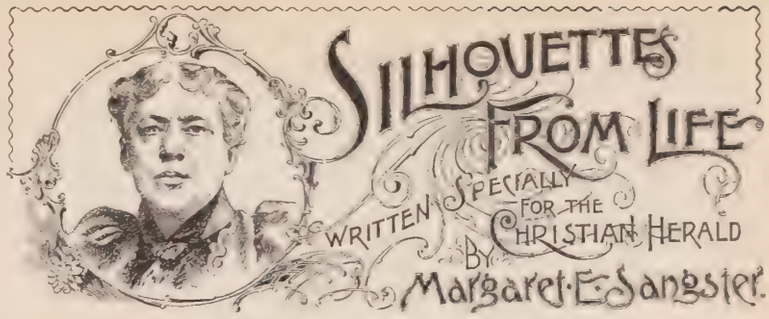
A Letter From One of the Friendless and Fallen Girls Saved at the Bethesda Home, Telling of Her New Life of Faith

A SINGULARLY beautiful letter, one of many received recently at the Bethesda Home for the reclamation of fallen and friendless women in Brooklyn, gives an idea of the way God is blessing the efforts made there to rescue the victims of sin. It is a letter of gratitude from a girl to her friends at the Home showing thankfulness to God for the change in her heart and life. She is now in domestic service with a kindly lady who knows her history, and who takes a warm interest in her. The girl writes:

I am very happy here and am getting on better than I expected. You know I was quite ignorant of this kind of work, except what I learned at the home. You said Jesus would help me and he has. Soon after I came, Mrs. —— told me to do something I had never done in my life before, and I did not know how to go about it. I was so sorry, for I thought she would think me stupid and would lose patience with me. Well, I remembered what you told me, and as I went down to the kitchen I just prayed to Jesus to give me wisdom. It was all in a moment, but at once I saw how the thing might be done, I did not know if it was the right way, but I did it so, and when Mrs. —— saw it she said it was beautiful. Don't you think it was Jesus helping me? I thought so, and it has been the same several times since. He seems so real to me, and like that woman he helped when he was here. I have much he arse I have been forgiven much. What a change it all is from the old life that en led a year ago. Oh, you need have no fear of my falling away. It would be impossible now. How kind you were to me! It was that that won me. I was so low down that escape seemed foolish to think of, and besides, I did not want to escape till you showed me how terrible it all was, and encouraged me to try. I thank Jesus every day, and ask him to bless you for all your kindness. Do try to save more of us, there are so many who might be saved.

TEACHING SEWING IN THE BETHESDA HOME.

The girl's appeal is pathetic, and it is a notable fact that nearly all the letters that come from these rescued girls contain such appeals. They want others rescued as they have been. Unhappily, it is impossible to do much in the present condition of the funds. With the best wishes to the work, and with the utmost economy in the management of the home, and although the ladies in charge of it work without a salary, and every cent that is received is spent in the actual unavoidable expenses, the efforts of all are crippled by the lack of money. It is sad to think how many precious souls might be won for Christ, how many of these women might be saved and made useful members of society, as the writer of the above letter has been, if there were only a few more dollars at command to provide board and lodging for them for a few weeks while they are being helped and taught. We will gladly receive and acknowledge in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD any gifts our readers are moved to send us to aid in this most Christ-like work.



GRANNY'S BIBLE.

"SPEAKING of Bibles," said Martha, "the handsomest one I ever saw in my life, belonged to Granny Pease out at Cresskill, a splendid Bible it was, went ahead of any of the new-fangled things you all prize so highly in these days!

"Big! Well I should say so. Granny couldn't have held it in her hand to save her life, not when she was a strong young woman, and she read that Bible of hers, day in and day out, every night and every morning for seventy-five years. It was given her as a wedding-present, and Granny lived to be ninety-five years old. A good old age, especially when one keeps her faculties as she did—sight clear, hearing good, intellect bright, up to the last.

"Queer! Well, she wasn't to say exactly queer, though she did grow a little difficult the last few years. Most old persons do. No wonder. They are lonesome, their old friends, who were young with them, all gone to heaven, the generations that are doing the world's work now, mostly too busy to think much about them. Granny was always sweet, if she was queer, and the family at her nephew John's, and her granddaughter Margaret's, both families were always good to her. Fact was, the whole town was awfully proud of Granny Pease; those colonial dames and daughters of the Revolution, you know, they boasted of her, and her folks set the greatest store by the little straight old lady, upright as a dart, with eyes like a hawk's and lint-white hair, always under a gay cap."

"Gay?"

"Yes, gay! Granny just scorned sober colors, and never would be seen in blacks and grays, with plain white caps, which are considered in a general way the becoming thing for a woman getting on in years. She couldn't abide them, and she always wore flowered delaines and calico of a chintz pattern. One gown she had when she was a frisky personage of eighty-six or thereabout, had yellow and red birds of paradise and blooming poppies and peonies mixed up on a pale blue ground. Her caps matched her dresses, floating ends of bright ribbon, wreaths and bunches of flowers, sometimes an ostrich feather. I say, Granny had a right to dress as she had a mind to; anyway, she asked nobody's leave, but did as she liked.

"I've taken notice," said Martha, putting down her stocking, and looking at me, "That the way to get your way in this troublesome world, is to take it, and have no fuss. Then you get it. Talk hinders some of us from having the standing-ground we've a right to have."

Martha was thinking about her own daughter, Rosalind, who never seems to know that mothers and aunts are grown up, but who is a master-hand at dictating and laying down the law. Once you argufy with Rosalind, you are lost, and poor Martha does naturally incline to stop and argufy.

"Her Bible! Yes, I'm coming to that. It was a big old family Bible, with pictures of Samson and Delilah, and Daniel in the den of lions, and little Samuel, and Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego in the fiery furnace, and a lot more.

"Its print was big and black, and Granny had marked it all through in a fashion of her own. There were silhouettes of all the children and grandchildren, black, cut out of paper in profile; they marked the texts she loved, the promises. The day her husband died, she read, 'When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee,' and she put a lock of his hair, and a piece of his wedding neck-tie, and of her wedding gown, old as Egypt both of them, but she'd kept them somewhere, and they stayed the rest of her life as book-marks in the chapter which was her comfort in the darkness of her woe.

"She had lots of old letters folded in everywhere, and a new dollar-bill that was never to be spent unless a day dawned when she hadn't anything for the Lord's treasury, and pieces of everybody's bridal dress, and of her own gowns, and the children's. Certificates of good conduct at school, and I can't tell you what she didn't have tucked away in that big Bible, with the great brass clasps that by and by couldn't be clasped, the book had grown so thick.

"The Psalms and the Proverbs and the Gospel of John and the Revelations were Granny's favorites, and so the most of her funny book-marks were to be found there, but she knew Isaiah all but by heart, and she had very choice pressed flowers and leaves along his golden texts. And Zechariah she liked to drop in on for a call now and again, and sometimes Kings and Chronicles, and one day I found her with her face lit up like the sunrise, and what was she reading but Leviticus, where it tells you not to glean your corners too closely, and not to curse the deaf, as if anybody would be so cowardly and so cruel as to do that, not to put a stumbling block in the path of the blind, not to bear a grudge, and to love your neighbor as yourself. 'Good for Moses,' said Granny. 'He's the most up-to-date Christian of the ages.'

"I've talked and expatiated," Martha went on, "over that droll old Bible with worn sheep-skin cover and the yellow pages, but I've not told you half. It lies on a shelf in the attic now, but when I climb the stairs to look at it, I see dear old Granny with her spectacles on, sitting at her round mahogany stand, reading God's own word, with a glow on her beautiful old face, as if the windows of the New Jerusalem were open, and the glory was pouring down.

"She was ninety-five when she was called home. What must it have been to her to drop the burden of the flesh, to wake up young and fair in her Father's house. She doesn't need the Bible there, but I'll be bound she remembers it, and often says bits of it over to herself, when there come lulls in the music, and a body gets a chance to think. I don't know what sort of robes she wears, but I'm sure she has managed to liven them up with flowers, and wherever Granny is, there are good times for the saints who dwell next door to her."

The SUNDAY SCHOOL

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER.

S. S. Lesson for March 31. Golden Text Matthew 11: 29. "Take My Yoke Upon You and Learn of Me."

BEARING THE YOKE.

ABOUT a year of Christ's life is described in the chapters from which the eleven lessons of the past quarter have been taken. It extends from the death of John the Baptist, which occurred, it is believed, late in March of the year A.D. 29, to Christ's departure from Jericho to Jerusalem to keep the Passover in the year 30. It was a year of waning popularity, of opposition and change of scene. It is difficult to construct a chronological story of the period, but there are certain landmarks from which an outline of Christ's movements may be gained. In April he was at Bethsaida and its neighborhood, east of the Jordan, on the northeast shore of the sea of Galilee. After a brief rest at Capernaum, he made a journey northward, reaching Mount Hermon, at the northern boundary of Palestine, about June. There it is believed the Transfiguration took place. A few weeks later we find him again at Capernaum, blessing the children. In October he was in Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles. About a month afterward he was again in Galilee, on his last visit to that region. At the feast of the Dedication, which was held in December, he was in Jerusalem again. Thence he went to Perea, on the east of the Jordan, remaining there, with the one exception of his visit to Bethany to raise Lazarus from the dead, until March, when it was time to set out for Jerusalem, to keep the Passover. He appears to have crossed the Jordan and traveled eastward along the frontier of Samaria, until he met the caravan with which his Galilean friends were going to Jerusalem, and then, with them, proceeded down the Jordan valley to Jericho. There, after being entertained by Zaccheus and curing the man born blind, he resumed his journey, arriving at Bethany on April 1. John says he reached there six days before the Passover, and we know that in that year the Passover was on April 7.

At the beginning of the year Jesus was at the summit of his popularity. The people wanted to take him by force and make him a king. They had been miraculously fed, and what better king did they desire [illegible] limited food? They were impatient with him, and when they learned that the kingdom to which he aspired was a spiritual kindom, they were disappointed. He told them of the conditions of membership in the kingdom, and claimed a position superior to Abraham and Solomon, and promised to give them life if they would follow him. But they had no spiritual perception, many of them doubtless thought him demented, and they ceased to listen to him. Only the twelve were faithful, and we may infer that Christ saw signs of wavering in them, otherwise he would not have asked them, "Will ye also go away?"

The ruling class in Jerusalem were not slow to take advantage of the defection. They had long been jealous of his popularity, and dreaded the effects of his teaching. Both the great parties had suffered at his hands. The Pharisees, equally with the Sadducees, had been condemned and denounced. The Scribes and the lawyers had been discomfited, and were sore after the defeats which had followed every conflict with him. They all perceived that if he were allowed to go on, the result of the work would not be mere reformation, but a totally new order of things, in which they would have no place. They wanted him silenced or removed, but they dare take no action while he had so many followers. They dreaded a popular tumult. But when the crowds around him melted away, they felt that their opportunity had come. They believed that all the venerable fabric of the law and the priesthood was menaced by his teaching, and they agreed with Caiaphas that it was better one life be sacrificed than that the whole nation should perish. Thus it was that when Jesus left Galilee his doom was sealed.

That Jesus was aware of the fact there can be no doubt. Apart from his prophetic knowledge, he would have abundant reason for seeing that a violent death awaited him in the near future. His withdrawal to Perea was probably a result of that apprehension. It was a quiet district, where he could have much time alone with his disciples. They must take up his work when he was gone from them, and carry it forward. But they were not fit for such an undertaking. They were ordinary working men, unused to public speaking, and, more than all, they did not themselves understand the principles of his life. When they went to Perea, they still clung to the idea of a temporal kiugdom, and apparently had not the faintest idea of the character of the work with which they were to be entrusted. In the three months that remained, they learned more than they had any idea of at the time. After the ascension, when everything was made clear, their thoughts went back to those few weeks and they understood what was then mysterious to them. From Luke we learn what was the character of the teaching. He, better than any of the other three evangelists, reports those wonderful discourses. The parables of the lost coin, the lost sheep, the Prodigal Son, the unjust steward, the great supper, the rich man and Lazarus, probably all belong to this period of teaching. So in prayer and teaching the precious weeks passed, until the momentous time came when only two or three troubled weeks of their Master's life remained, and they could realize that the way to the crowns, for which they had been so eager, was the way of burden-bearing and of the cross, and understand the significance of the words, "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me."

BETWEEN JERUSALEM AND JERICHO.

THE POOL OF SILOAM, WHERE THE BLIND MAN RECEIVED SIGHT.

Summing up the results of the year's association with Jesus, the twelve men had gained much knowledge of their Master and his mission. They had seen him take no step, when John the Baptist was imprisoned and murdered, to deliver him by a miracle, and they learned, as many have had to learn since then in sorrow and distress, that God does not always interfere to save the most distinguished and useful of his servants from injustice and death. He may let them die even at a time when they seem to be most needed. They had seen by three stupendous miracles that Christ could give food in inexhaustible profusion if occasion demanded; that he could give sight to a man who had never seen; and that he could raise the dead. They had learned his gentleness in his dealing with the children; his compassion and his idea of universal brotherhood from his parable of the good Samaritan and his treatment of Zaccheus and his claims for absolute supremacy in affections and the life from his treatment of the rich young ruler, and, more t three of them had been privileged to the Transfiguration inherent glory won Chinese Brought to Christ.

Ten Years' Mission Work in Portland and its Glorious Results—A Great Rescue Work Begun among Chinese Women and Girls.

The opening of mission work among the Chinese in Oregon and Washington, is largely due to the interest of the late Rev. A. L. Lindsley, D. D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Portland, Ore. He introduced a Resolution before the Synod of Columbia in 1884 requesting the Board of Foreign Missions to send a missionary to the Synod. Early in 1885 Rev. W. S. Holt returned to the United States from Shanghai, China, in which country he and Mrs. Holt had been missionaries since 1873. They were appointed to remove to Portland [illegible] as health would permit, and open the mission. The middle of June, 1885, found them in Portland, where they were met by Rev. M. Condit, of the Board's Mission in California. After a careful survey of the field, and a visit to Tacoma and Seattle, in Washington, it was very evident that Portland was a centre of Chinese population. Accordingly that city was made the headquarters of the mission. A night mission school was opened July 6. The first night there were but six or eight scholars, but within a month the number had increased to fifty and soon after there were sixty scholars. The branches taught are reading, writing and spelling, with the occasional student who studies arithmetic, geography, grammar or history. The scholars come from near-by laundry classes except laundrymen. On Thursday evening a prayer meeting is held. Sabbath evenings there is Sabbath school from 6.30 to 7.15, followed by a preaching service in the Chinese language, and a Bible class succeeds the evening service. Aside from these [illegible] attention is given to visitations, distribution of religious literature, correspondence, missionary addresses in parts of the Synod, and in the summer vacation [illegible] tours are made to the cities in the two States, where Chinese are to be found.

REV. W. S. HOLT.

A recent enterprise undertaken in Portland is a free dispensary. The Homœopathic Medical Association appoints the physicians, who gladly give their services. The first medicines were purchased by the mission, but for more than six months, all medicines have been paid for by the contributions of Chinese friends.

Another prominent feature of the work is the Chinese Women's Home. Mrs. Holt's visits among the Chinese soon she learned that a system of slavery of the most debasing form exists among them here. Women and girls are bought and held for immoral purposes. It sometimes happens that these poor creatures [illegible] to escape from their servitude. But [illegible] is impossible without outside aid. The home was started through the rescue of a poor woman who was taken into Mrs. [illegible]'s house. An effort was made to get possession of her on a writ of habeas corpus but the Court informed her she could [illegible] her own choice, and she chose to remain where she was. Not long after, another refugee came to the house and she cared for. Then another woman sent word that she wanted help. Mrs. Holt and a lady friend, accompanied by a deputy sheriff and a writ, went to the place, the sheriff burst open the door and found the woman in the grasp of a man who held one hand over her mouth. Of course, she was set at liberty. It was now evident that there was pressing need for permanent work of this sort. The ladies of Mr. Holt's church took up the matter, a house was rented and a matron secured, and the "Home" was open. The next step was to rescue the little girls under fifteen years of age who were kept in disreputable houses. This rescue work is allowed by the laws of our State to any society incorporated for the purpose. The church ladies formed a legal society. Mrs. Holt and the matron, with the aid of the officers, descended on some of the suspected houses, and took away three children. One of them was returned upon the marriage of the couple who held her, and on their removal from their disreputable dwelling to a decent place.

Over the other two children, there was a stubborn fight. The case went through the circuit court and the girls were ordered sent to China to a reputed grandmother. The supreme court issued a mandamus on the circuit judge. But the children were already on a ship bound for China. However, the ship must pass Astoria, so the circuit judge issued his orders to the sheriff at Astoria. Mrs. Holt and Mrs. Holbrook carried the orders by steamer. They reached Astoria at 4 A.M., found the sheriff, chartered a small steamer and went out and met the ship and took the girls ashore. The case went to the supreme court on a final hearing and the girls were awarded to the custody of the Home, where they are to-day, bright, intelligent and happy, and well on the way to useful, womanly lives.

The ladies of Portland have built a comfortable house for the use of the Home, and the work is now well established. Thirty-seven women and girls have shared its protection and help. It stands for much hard, disagreeable, trying work. For example, Mrs. Dong Faiy, a Christian Chinese woman, who is an invaluable helper, and Mrs. Holt, both have been arrested and compelled to go to another part of the State for trial on a false charge, because a Chinese woman ran away from a man who had bought her from her husband, and she received help and protection at the Home. But the work has been done in the Master's name, and he has owned and blessed it.

Outside of Portland, schools have been open in various parts of the two States, and there has been much good work done. At present there are flourishing schools in Astoria, under the charge of Rev. V. F. Partch, who is on his way to Tsinanfoo, but is detained by the Chinese-Japanese war; and in Pendleton under the care of Mrs. Moole, a godly woman who is glad to help. The pastors in both these places and the churches give their assistance in every way possible.

Mr. Holt has baptized thirty-five converts since beginning the work. Some of them are now in their own country, witnessing a good profession. Others are scattered throughout the United States, but they make themselves known as Christians, and help their own people whenever opportunity offers.

THE CHINESE WOMEN'S HOME, PORTLAND, OREGON.

The whole work, thus far, is one that has given the greatest encouragment to its founders and conductors, who are grateful to have been the means of spiritual aid and enlightenment to so many of the Chinese in America. Our illustrations on this page are from originals furnished by Missionary Holt, the photograph of the group of Chinese scholars having been taken by one of the pupils by flash-light. The exterior of the Women's Home where the refuge work is conducted, is also shown above.

VICTOR HUGO ON IMMORTALITY.

Europe or the world has held few nobler spirits than Victor Hugo, the famous author, whose genius had shed a light over the literature of the present century. This is what Hugo, in his closing years, wrote down, as the very inmost expression of his heart and brain and soul, on the great subject of the hereafter: "I feel in myself the future life. I am like a forest which has been more than once cut down. I am rising, I know, toward the sky. The sunshine is on my head. The earth gives me its generous sap, but heaven lights me with the reflection of unknown worlds. You say the soul is nothing, but the resultant of bodily powers. Why, then, is my soul more luminous when my bodily powers begin to fail? Winter is on my head and eternal spring is in my heart. Then I breathe at this hour the fragrance of the lilacs, the violets, and the roses as at twenty years. The nearer I approach the end, the plainer I hear around me the immortal symphonies of the worlds which invite me."

REQUESTS FOR PRAYER.

We are told that "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." Belief in this assurance has prompted many persons to ask the prayers of the readers of this journal for special blessings. REVERENTIAL DAYS.

WHEN this year the season of fasting opened the good people of every denomination of Christians became reverential. We can all see that, physically, mentally and spiritually, a pause in merrymaking and festivity is advantageous. There is in the world a large population who are underfed and need no charge against gluttony and surfeit, for they have a hard struggle to get even the necessities of life; among the prosperous classes there are many who eat too much and drink too much and sacrifice solemnity to carousal, and go to bed only a little while before they ought to be ready to rise. So many of us in February said: "Hail, season of moderation!" In our time many of the non-Episcopal churches observe two of the holidays, the one charged with memories of crucifixion, the other rapturous with the memories of resurrection. Good Friday and Easter morning. Pathos of tenderest music for the one. Open diapason of doxology for the other. Tears for the one. Flowers in garlands and crowns for the other. Say you that all days ought to be sacred? So they ought. But as what is everybody's business is nobody's business, so what ought to belong to all the days belongs to none of them. As I am glad for the multiplication of secular holidays which allow the lifting of burdens from the body so I am glad of the multiplication of religious days for the recuperation of the soul. The danger is not in too many holy days. The danger is in the direction of scarcity. And so we find in all denominations something to admire, something to inspire, something to practice. Under different names, but following the great Commander who is leading to certain and universal victory, enough honor for us to be in the army and the soldiers of such a captain. Quit you like men. Wherever the battle is thickest let us be in the fight, for I see flaming against the night sky the words which are to this day inscribed in Damascus over the door of the Mohammedan mosque, which was once a Christian church, and though now the building is against Christ, no Mohammedan has thought to tear down the inscription, and it seems to have been miraculously preserved: "Thy kingdom, O Christ, is a kingdom of all ages, and thy dominion lasts through all generations."

GOOD BLOOD AND BAD BLOOD.

THERE is such a thing as good blood and there is such a thing as bad blood. There are families that have had a moral twist in them for a hundred years back. They have not been careful to keep the family record in that regard. There have been escapades and maraudings and scoundrelisms and moral deficits all the way back, whether you call it kleptomania or pyromania or dipsomania, or whether it be in a milder form, and amount to no mania at all. The strong probability is that the present wrong-doer started life with nerve, muscle and bone contaminated. As some start life with a natural tendency to nobility and generosity and kindness and truthfulness, there are others who start life with just the opposite tendency, and they are born liars, or born malcontents, or born outlaws, or born swindlers. There is in England a school that is called the Princess Mary school. All the children in that school are the children of convicts. I once had the pleasure of speaking at its anniversary, the Earl of Kintore presiding. By a wise law in England, after parents have committed a certain number of crimes and thereby show themselves incompetent rightly to bring up their children, the little ones are taken from under pernicious influences and put in reformatory schools, where all gracious and kindly influences shall be brought upon them. Of course the experiment is young and it is yet to be demonstrated how large a percentage of the children of convicts may be brought up to respectability and usefulness, but we all know that it is more difficult for children of bad parentage to do right than for children of good parentage. In this country we are taught by the Declaration of American Independence that all people are born equal, and there never was a greater misrepresentation put in one sentence than in that sentence which implies that we are all born equal. You may as well say that flowers are born equal, or animals are born equal. Why does one horse cost $100 and another cost $10,000? Why does one sheep cost $5 and another cost $1,000? Difference in blood. We are all wise enough to recognize the difference in blood in horses, in cattle, in sheep, but we are not wise enough to make allowance for the difference in human blood. Now, I demand by the law of eternal fairness, that you be more lenient in your criticism of those who were born wrong, in whose ancestral line there was a hangman's knot, or who came from an ancestral tree, the fruit of which for centuries has been gnarl-and worm-eaten. It is a very different thing to swim with the current to what it is to swim against the current. All these considerations ought to make us merciful in our dealings with others.

THE GLORIOUS CHURCH.

MEN may desecrate the church as Cromwell when he stabled his cavalry horses in St. Paul's Cathedral; or break off the image of Christ, as did the iconoclasts in York Minster; or hurl against it august literary antipathies, as did Gibbon; or plot its overthrow, as do some in every community whose pride and hate and debauchery are reproved by the Ten Commandments which it thunders, and the Sermon on the Mount which it breathes. But it will stand as long as the earth stands, the same unique, and wonder-working, and beatific, and miraculous thing for which God decreed it. Small wits tax their brain to say things that will put her at disadvantage, but many of them will send for its condolence when dying, and their children will be gathered up under its benedictions after the parental curse has been removed. Through her gates will march all the influences for good that shall ever reach our world. Take her membership as a mass, not speaking of the acknowledged exceptions, they are the noblest, grandest, kindest, best men and women of the ages. But for them the earth would long ago have been a burned-out volcano. They have been the salt that has kept the human race from putrefaction insufferable either to human or angelic olfactories. You lying and hypocritical world, shut up those slanders about the Church of Christ, an institution, which, far from being what it ought to be and never pretending to be perfect, is five hundred times better than any other institution that the world ever saw or ever dreamt of. The highest honor I ever had, and the highest honor I shall ever receive, and the highest honor I ever want is to have my name on her records as a member. At her altars I repented. At her sacraments I believed. In her service let me die. From her doors let me be buried.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

If any of our readers who know of active, zealous Christian workers in their neighborhood who, without fee or reward, are devoting time and means to the service of Christ in rescuing the lost, uplifting the fallen or befriending the sick and poor, would send us biographical sketches of such persons—men or women—we should be glad. The story of their work, showing their methods and the success which has attended them, might encourage other Christian people to undertake similar work in their cities. The sketch should be accompanied in every instance by a photograph of the person. Address all letters to Editor of Christian Workers' Department, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

P. Clark, Scranton, Pa. 1. We do not know. 2. For the number of religious journals and their circulation during 1894, we would refer you to some reliable newspaper directory. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD printed last year 8,650,250 copies. Hence its average circulation was 166,351 copies per week. 3. We think on the whole that the readers benefit by a paper printing advertisements, as the majority of religious papers, including THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, could not afford to make so good a paper if they did not have the income derived from this source.

Sallie A. Davis, Milford Mills, Pa. Whose son was Judas Iscariot? The Bible says "Simon's son;" does that mean Simon Peter?

He was the son of Simon (John 6: 71 and 13 2, 26), unquestionably a different individual from Simon Peter. The name "Simon," was a common one in Syria, in post-Babylonian times.

Subscriber. Would it be wrong for a preacher, in preparing or delivering a sermon, to use as his own the thoughts and suggestions of others, without mentioning where he got them? Would he be acting a lie, deceiving the people, or doing an injustice to the one from whom he takes the thoughts by doing so?

It would be plagiarism and a sin, and the preacher doing so would be deceiving his hearers and taking the credit that rightfully belonged to another. If a pastor is unable to preach original sermons, he is quite at liberty to select from other sources, giving proper and honorable credit where he quotes literally.

Reader, Edwin, Pa. Would we profane our church by holding in it concerts and lectures? Are we not limiting its usefulness by closing its doors to such entertainments? We are in the country and have no other suitable building.

There are concerts and lectures of a character that make them entirely suitable for a church building, and there are others that would be a distinct profanation of the Lord's Temple, which is consecrated to his service. A conscientious discrimination by the pastor or trustees, or other officials in charge, will not fail to distinguish between the two classes of entertainments. The social side of church life, especially in rural parishes, should not be neglected, and it frequently happens that a fair or concert or sociable, the holding of which in the church many might regard as an offence, can with perfect propriety be held somewhere else outside of church walls.

Constant Reader, Westchester, N. Y. Did the witch of Endor raise Samuel, or did the Lord permit Samuel to appear? If neither thing happened, who or what was it that talked with Saul?

Volumes have been written on the question whether, in the scene at Endor, an imposture or a real apparition appeared. Eustathius and a majority of the early Christian fathers held the former opinion, and represent it as a deception of the evil one; Origen held the latter view. It should be remembered that Saul, at the time was forsaken of God and that, rendered desperate by his sins, he had recourse to this woman, who in the Hebrew writings is described as "a mistress of Ob" or a necromancist, (not a "witch") who obtained a living by pretending to have intercourse with spirits, while the Greek writers describe her as a ventriloquist. Josephus, the Jewish historian, describes her as one of a class of fortune-tellers who had been banished by the king. Saul's highly wrought nervous condition at the time, combined with the fact that he himself saw no vision or spirit, but simply listened to and accepted the necromancer's description of an aged man of godlike appearance, should be taken into consideration, and these facts d... less influenced the early fathers in rea... the conclusion that the wretched king ... been the victim of an imposition.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

IN AN EGYPTIAN TOMB.

PROTESTS are coming from recent explorers in Egypt against the carelessness of the men who have charge of the tombs in that country. They report that the paintings on the walls are smeared with grease and smoke from the candles of the guides, that the frescoes are being chipped by tourists, and that even the statues are being broken. An indignant Egyptologist has now taken photographs by flashlight of the wall of the tomb of Rameses I. and of another tomb at Dayr-el-Bahari to show how the carvings have been defaced. A picture taken from these photographs appears on this page. It is specially interesting to Bible students from the fact that Rameses I was the grandfather of the Pharaoh who, it is now generally believed, was the oppressor of the Hebrews. His Pharaoh was Rameses II, the son of Seti, who was the son of Rameses I. The interior of his tomb is covered, like those of other Pharaohs, with frescoes all richly painted in colors which are still fresh after more than thirty-six centuries. There were also a number of statues of the king found in his tomb, all singularly life-like. It was for a long time a subject of wonder that the Egyptians should have devoted so much skill and labor to the production of works of art which they took special pains to conceal from the sight of men. They knew, or rather hoped, that no one would ever gaze upon them, yet they lavished upon them all their best efforts. It is now suggested as a result of study of their ancient records, that they had philosophical reasons for the apparent inconsistency. They believed that every man had a principle of life, differing from his mind and soul, perpetuating his being, and this they called his Ka. They thought that at death it was not extinguished, but merely left the body and could reanimate it after the lapse of a long period. The Ka, they supposed, went to the tomb with the body and waited there with it until the soul returned from long pilgrimages, when the man would be reconstructed and live eternally. If the body were accidently destroyed the Ka would be homeless. The embalmers did their utmost to prevent the catastrophe, but if all failed, then the statue of the deceased might serve as an abode for the Ka, or it might even occupy it while waiting for the soul to return. In the absence of any more reasonable explanation, this may be accepted as certainly plausible, if not absolutely true. It shows how in that remote time men were groping and seaching for the truth, which the Apostle Paul records: "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." (II.Cor. 5: 1.)

PAINTED FRESCOES ON THE WALLS OF PHARAOH'S TOMB.

Fever Cure for Insanity.

Several specialists in brain disease in New York were interviewed last week in reference to the reported cure of an insane patient in Vienna, by the injection of Dr. Koch's tuberculine. The report had stated that the injection had produced fever, as it was intended to do, and the patient had recovered the use of his reason. One of the specialists expressed doubts as to the possibility of it being possible to cure insanity by the production of fever, if the insanity was due to structural disease of the brain, or to organic disorder. He said that in cases of functional disorder, of melancholia, or of insanity resulting from meningitis or from nervous shock, he could understand a cure being effected by a high fever which could be induced by Dr. Koch's inoculation. He had himself experimented in some cases with diluted snake poison and the results had been satisfactory. The general disturbance of the system produced by the injection appeared to induce a new habit of mind, which led to the patient's complete restoration to mental health. He mentioned also as a curious fact that an insane patient contracting smallpox or some other virulent disease was liable to recover his reason, and he had himself known such cases. It seems strange that a fever which is so distressing and enfeebling in an ordinary case, should be employed and should succeed as a curative agent in mental ailments. Ministers and Christian workers, however, have often seen cases of depravity so persistent as to be akin to insanity cured by some physical illness, which alarmed the wrongdoer and made him think of his latter end. (Ps. 119: 67.)

Making Natural Pearls.

A device for securing genuine pearls is described in a journal devoted to the jewelry trade. It is well known that a pearl is the result of an oyster's effort to protect itself from discomfort. If a grain of sand or some other hard substance finds its way into the shell, the oyster proceeds to cover the intruding substance with nacre to give it a smooth exterior. Nacre is the beautiful irredescent material which gives to the lining of sea-shells and mother-of-pearl their chief beauty. The result of the oyster's proceeding is to turn the sand into a pearl. A French jeweler who has visited the pearl-oyster beds, says that the Chinese open the oyster shells slightly, insert a minute atom of dirt and then remove the oysters to a separate canal, where they remain for five or six months. In the majority of cases the oyster dies, but in some there is a pearl. The improved system is to drill a small hole in the shell and put in a small globule of glass and plug up the hole and seal it. This is to avoid the risk of killing the oyster by opening the shell. The result attained is a more beautiful jewel, where one is made at all, the glass being a sharper irritant as well as a purer basis for the pearl. It will be found that some of the brightest jewels that will adorn Christ's crown in eternity have come from an analogous process. The trials which the enemy of souls was permitted to send with the object of destroying him or irritating him led to the exercise of more grace and patience and the production of a shining example to the world. (II. Cor. 4: 17.)

Removing the Sacred Codfish.

At twilight on March 7, a quaint and curious ceremony was performed in Boston, Mass. A committee of fifteen legislators preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House marched in solemn procession from the old building, in which the lower branch of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts formerly held its sessions, to the palatial chamber now in use. The procession was an escort to the painted wooden model of a codfish, which is to be placed on brackets over the Speaker's chair. It was a conspicuous object in the old chamber and no one knows how long it had been there. The journals of the house record that in 1784, more than a century ago, Mr. John Rowe moved that "leave might be given to hang up the representation of a codfish . . . as had been usual formerly," and leave was unanimously given to keep up the custom apparently old even then. Accordingly the emblem was suspended, a wooden image four feet and eleven inches long, carved out of a single block of wood and embellished with a coat of paint. It has remained there ever since and has now been removed with due state to the new house. Lest any irreverent person should ridicule the proceedings, the Committee presented a report setting forth the grandeur of the principles of which the codfish might be considered as emblematical. The emblem was to remind the legislators, among other things, of the struggles and privations of the Puritans and the Pilgrim Fathers whom many times it relieved in want and famine. It was also to remind them of the basis of the commerce of the Commonwealth, its first export having been a cargo of fish. And it was to remind them too of the possibility of the descendants of fishermen becoming the rivals of the statesmen, generals and admirals of foreign lands. If, said the Committee, quoting a revered historian, Massachusetts had a tutelary genius in the brute creation, it was the creature whose image was then before them. One may hope that all the good lessons the codfish is capable of teaching will be learned by the legislators. They are proverbially a forgetting kind of people to whom an object lesson may be useful. In the nineteenth century and in the city of culture there is no danger of it becoming like the totems of the Indians, the fetiches of the Africans and the idols of the Chinese, an object of worship. Perhaps it is more likely to be treated as a mere ornament, without significance just as the cross in gold and jewels is often worn by people who are oblivious of Christ's injunction, which it symbolizes, to take up the cross and follow him. (Matt. 16: 24,)

Compelled to Run.

One of the most singular driving accidents on record is reported from a New Jersey farming district. A painter who had undertaken some work at a distant farm hired a business wagon and drove out to the scene of his operations. The horse was jogging along steadily, and the man was paying little attention to him when a deep gully in the road was crossed. There was a sharp jolt and the man was pitched from his seat to the ground. He fell on his feet, between the whiffletree and the heels of the horse. He grasped the shafts on each side of him and tried to raise himself, but they were too far apart to give him the necessary purchase. He tried to stop the horse by calling to him, but failed, and his shouts only incited the animal to an increase of speed. He was obliged to run, keeping pace with the horse, for if he fell, he was sure to be kicked on the head by the horse's heels and possibly dragged along the rough road. Happily for him, his predicament was seen by a man at work on the road who ran out and stopped the horse, after it had run nearly a mile with the man at its heels. Heedlessness in the conduct of life often brings consequences on those involved as disagreeable as those incurred by this man by heedlessness in driving, and sometimes there is no one at hand able to rescue. Many a man by an indiscretion has been brought into a situation in which he must endanger his life and reputation, or follow another in a career of crime. (Prov. 29: 24.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Church Members Seeking Employment or wishing to add to their income may hear of something to their advantage, by sending their names and addresses to Box J, Station D, New York.

Bishop Tucker states that a Uganda Man will willingly work three months to obtain a copy of the New Testament.

The Ministers of the Various Denominations in Fall River, Mass., have voted to send an invitation to Mr. D. L. Moody to hold a series of meetings in the city next fall.

Leonard Weaver's Services at Shamokin, Pa., have resulted in a large number of conversions. Mr. W. S. Weeden, of the Washington Square M. E. Church, New York, has had charge of the musical part of the services. The meetings have been crowded from the beginning.

Mr. E. P. Telford's Mission in the Baptist Church at Falmouth, England, has been attended with most marked success. Crowds have attended nightly—sometimes scarcely a seat was left untaken—even the doors of a place of worship have been coming night after night. Many conversions have taken place.

The American Sunday School Union has decided to remove the Depository it has occupied in New York from the Bible House to the Constable Building at Fifth Avenue and Eighteenth Street. The Society will in future confine its stock there to its own publications or those of special interest to Sunday Schools.

The Cremation of a Church Mortgage at the North Main Avenue Baptist Church, Scranton, Pa., was witnessed recently by a crowded assemblage of the members and congregation. The Pastor, Rev. W. G. Watkins, presided at the ceremony and expressed the pleasure with which all connected with the church viewed the extinction of the debt of ten thousand dollars which had so long crippled the society. The debt had been honestly paid and the papers representing it were burned.

The Three Bible Societies of England, Scotland and this country have issued a miniature Gospel of St. John in Japanese for the use of the troops. The book is only two and three-quarters by one and seven-eighths inches, has a guarding-flap, and is on extremely thin paper, but very clear and readable.

The Mayor of Brockton, Mass., has prohibited Sunday concerts in the town during his term of office. The joint judiciary committee of the Massachusetts Legislature has favorably reported a bill to the Senate observance of the Lord's Day. The Sunday Protective League of the State has been conducting a vigorous campaign for some time past.

Rev. John C. Collins, Secretary of the Christian Workers' Association, writes: Preparations are already being made for the great Bible and Missionary Conference to be held in 1895. A number of leading ministers in New York and Brooklyn such as Dr. David Burrell, Dr. Greer, Dr. Atterbury, Dr. Edward Judson, Dr. A. C. Dixon, Dr. A. B. Kendig, and Dr. Gregg, and several prominent business men have expressed a deep interest in it and have promised to co-operate heartily if it is held in New York, which now seems probable.

A Movement is on Foot Among the Baptist Churches of Newark, N. J., to work for the Italians of that city of whom there are many thousands. The Mt. Pleasant church has for several years had a mission in close proximity to the Italian section in Seventh Avenue, which now becomes a permanent church.

The Second Annual Sea Side Bible Conference Conducted by Dr. J. W. Munhall will be held at Educational Hall, Asbury Park, N. J., July 19–29. Among the speakers will be Dr. James H. Brookes; A. T. Pierson; W. J. Erdman; Albert Erdman; A. C. Dixon and Major Whittle.

The Statement is made by a French Astronomer that the situation of the stars in the heavens on Good Friday, April 12, this year will be the same as in the year 1 of the Christian Era when Christ was crucified, and that this is the first year since that time that the heavenly bodies have all occupied those relative positions.

Miss Jennie Smith, the Famous Railroad Evangelist of Mountain Lake Park, Md., has been having great success at Kent, O. She has organized a Railroad Temperance Association there and has done a great deal of evangelistic work. She was told that there was no hope in the town for either a religious or temperance movement; but Miss Smith knew that some of the many railroad men to whom she had been a blessing lived there and would form a nucleus. The result has exceeded her hopes.

Dr. L. W. Munhall is holding Evangelistic services at Saginaw, Mich. The "Evening News" of that city says that the Teutonia Hall, in which the meetings are held, is not large enough to hold the crowds that come. The interest is spreading through the town and the surrounding neighborhood. Daily meetings are being held in the First Presbyterian and the Michigan Avenue Methodist Churches. The "News" publishes a list of nineteen ladies at whose houses prayer meetings are held, and states that at any of them strangers and inquirers will be welcomed.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman's Meetings at Troy, N.Y., have brought the churches into association. A correspondent of "The Examiner" writes: "It has been estimated that ten thousand different persons have been present, an aggregate of at least fifty thousand people at the evening meetings alone. For the first ten days the afternoon meetings were held in the Fifth Avenue Baptist and State Street Methodist Churches; and during the last two weeks, in the Second Presbyterian. Twenty-two churches, with their pastors, have been officially connected, including the five Baptist churches in the city proper; and every service has seen the pastors of many of the outlying churches present."

Relief Work Nearly Ended.

What has been Accomplished by Our Volunteer Distributors and through other Channels—The Worst Probably over, except in South Dakota and Oklahoma.

COMPARATIVELY few new applications calling for immediate relief have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the week and everything indicates that the very vigorous and extensive measures adopted have resulted in relieving the most urgent cases of suffering. Our distributors in the Western states are laboring with the same zeal and thoroughness as their work approaches a close as at the beginning of their voluntary task. Many of the reports received from those who have already completed their labors are such as may well gladden the hearts of the generous contributors, who supplied them with the means of accomplishing so much good. Mrs. O. S. Wilson, Relief Distributor at Inman, Neb., writes:

Very many hearts it thanks from myself and the many whose hearts have been made to greatly rejoice over the boxes and whose homes have been cheered and made by the generosity of noble Christian hearts, and your very kind appeals in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Thanks for the loving sympathetic response of its many readers in supplying in our town and vicinity three hundred very needy and suffering ones with clothing, bed, fuel and money. Yes, many heartfelt prayers ascend that our loving Heavenly Father will reward you all an hundredfold in this life and in the world to come—life eternal. Your reward is certain, your reaping-time is coming: God's sure word of promise never has, nor never will fail: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, my little ones, ye did it unto me." "A cup of cold water given in a disciple's name shall not lose its reward."

The seed-grain question is becoming one of the greatest moment, as spring approaches. The State Board of Railroad Commissioners has received requisitions for the seed-grain appropriation from twenty-seven counties. Ten counties have declined the amount apportioned to them and twelve counties have got to be heard from. Large contributions of seed-grain or money to purchase the same are expected from Chicago, St. Paul, St. Louis and several other cities, where assistance has been promised.

A Relief Conference in Nebraska.

At a conference held at Lincoln, Neb., lately, to consult with reference to relief measures from the drouth-stricken district there were clerical representatives for the Episcopal, Congregational, Methodist, Christian, Presbyterian and Lutheran churches. A majority of those present are engaged in travelling over the state and are familiar with the prevailing conditions in the forty-nine counties receiving aid. A committee was appointed to publish a statement of the facts. It appeared from the reports of county officials and other sources of information that while immediate needs are supplied, there are at least 100,000 people to be supported until another crop is raised. For the support of these the State Relief Commission has left from donations and the state appropriation, $43,000. This makes no provision for feed for working teams and other live stock, or for seed grain. That these people may become self-sustaining, at least $1,500,000 worth of feed and seed will be needed.

This statement is corroborative of the estimate published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD several weeks ago, that even after immediate needs were supplied, there would still remain the great problem of supporting 100,000 persons until the next harvest. This is the great task to which Manager Ludden's Relief Commission is now addressing itself. Unfortunately, donations to the Commission have greatly decreased, and the storehouses are nearly empty, but a substantial fund has been preserved for the worst emergency, and the Commission hopes this fund will increase. Many donations are being secured by the delegates from the different states who are now soliciting aid in the other States. As an illustration of a condition which prevails in many counties into which considerable relief has been sent, we quote the following from a letter received from Rev. F. Harrison Dry, pastor M.E. Church, Oxford, Neb.:

One Pastor's Needy District.

[illegible] conversation about his own neighborhood, which shows a condition worse than I anticipated, and he [illegible] for even worse conditions in the near future. We have been blessed with a splendid rain and continuous warm weather. This is our day of fasting and prayer.

Rev. J. Q. Helms, Missionary of Burwell, Neb., writes:

Much depends on the crops of this season, and if we are not helped now, we may be in a more helpless condition another year. We need 2000 bushels of wheat and corn or the money to buy with.

A Committee of Citizens of District No. 43, Dawson Co., has made a public appeal for feed and seed.

Seedsmen Extending Aid.

During the week, a number of leading seedsmen have communicated with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with reference to the supplying of vegetable seed to the destitute farmers and others in the West who can use it to advantage. L. L. May & Co., of St. Paul, Minn., have already sent $400 worth of free seed into Nebraska; James Vicks' Sons of Rochester, have forwarded free hundreds of collections and are still shipping; D. M. Terry & Co., Detroit, Mich., have already furnished, free, through the regularly constituted Relief Committees, seeds for a large number of families; Johnson & Stokes, Philadelphia, last week sent a large consignment of seeds to one Relief Association and are sending others; W. Atlee Burpee & Co., whose first donation of seeds was shipped direct to Manager Ludden at Lincoln, have another donation ready for shipment; Wm. Henry Maule of Philadelphia, another well-known seedsman, has sent many packages of garden seeds to the drought-stricken sections; J. Vaughan of Chicago, Ill., has offered to donate two hundred packages of garden seeds, which will be forwarded to Manager Ludden; H. W. Buckbee, Rockford, Ill., has already helped a large number of sufferers with free seeds and is still continuing the good work.

Reports from Distributors.

Some of our reports show an amount of self-sacrifice on the part of the Distributors that deserves more than mere passing recognition. Mr. H. F. Merwin, of Beaver City, Neb., writes as follows:

Mr. Crutcher has handed me a postal card from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund with the request that I fill out blank on return card and remail to you Mr. Crutcher is one of the elders in the Presbyterian Church and as we are without a pastor all aid for our church has been sent to him. My wife was one of the committee for the distribution of the aid given by our own people and he was so well pleased with her methods that he requested her to distribute all aid sent from abroad. Up to date we have received from all sources, eleven barrels and eight boxes, some of it from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and it is impossible to tell how much of the rest was sent through reading the appeals in your paper. It was a big undertaking for one woman feeble in health hardly able to do her own work for a family of three, but her heart is in the work and it seemed as if she had been given special strength for the occasion.

Mrs. M., has tried hard to make the very best disposition of every article. The things have not been on exhibition and those who are helped only see what they get or what is necessary to secure a fit, and so all go away satisfied. Many of the garments are of no use while only a very few have been poor, but there has been nothing so very poor but somebody was only too glad to get it. At the end of the second week she had helped over forty families and as she only supplied their most pressing wants, many times needing to do that over, they have been back two, three and four times. At the end of the second week she broke down. To date she has helped over sixty families averaging not less than four persons each, and I don't know that five would be placing it too high.

President Lowrie's Hearty Letter.

Another letter that affords a very clear and most interesting illustration of how faithfully and thoroughly the relief work has been conducted, is from Mr. N.S. Lowrie, President of the Holt County Relief Committee, O'Neill, Neb., who writes:

Anna M. Saunders, Commander of the Order of Good Templars of the State of Nebraska, through whose organization a portion of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund was distributed, writes from Nelson, Neb., as follows:

All the parties to whom I have sent the money are men and women true and tried in the matter of making sacrifices for others, earnest Christian men and women, who will pray to our Heavenly Father to give them wisdom in the distribution of the trust we have imposed upon them. It is a wonderful work you have been able to do. May our Father in heaven bless you, and may THE CHRISTIAN HERALD continue to bring hope and courage into these homes.

The Work in Kansas.

Relief work in Kansas is in excellent shape and the Topeka "Capital's" Relief Fund is accomplishing much good in the distressed districts. We are still in receipt of many letters from these districts appealing for aid, but all urgent and worthy cases are being promptly relieved through the established channels.

Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, our Sunday School Missionary, in a letter reviewing his recently finished work of distribution in Kansas, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"I found the destitution in Western Kansas far greater than I expected and sought to supply it as far as I could, pro-rating the Fund after the most reliable information I could obtain from a canvass of the counties and townships by well-organized Relief Committees and other trustworthy sources.

"The counties of Norton, Thomas, Graham, Grove, and adjoining territory, have received most largely, and adequately of clothing, but the supply of provisions will need to be refurnished in a month or six weeks from the time they were helped. At Quinter, the crowds were the most pitiful I saw while in the relief work, their needs being greater than elsewhere in Kansas or Nebraska. The distribution there alone included Quinter, Buffalo Park, Granfield, Grinell, Oakley, Hoxie, Beaver, Phelps, Skelton, Collyer, McKenny, Ogallala, Banner, Calalpa, Goodwater, Shields, Utica, Gove, and Jerome. In all cases the most needy were given the preference.

"Unforeseen storms so delayed and upset all reasonable calculations, that it was nearly impossible for some committees, to whom I had sent circulars at stations, to meet me on the trains. I think with the funds you gave me, the New York cars and the car from Armstrong, Mo., I have been able to relieve in food, fuel, or clothing about $000 people."

Faithful Distributors.

The wife of a Kansas pastor, Mrs. Frank Fleischer, of Minneapolis, sends us, giving a very touching description of the devotion of one of our Volunteer Distributors in that State. It is one of many such experiences, for we have found the Distributors' work, as a whole, to be worthy of the highest praise. She writes:

Miss Kelly was at my house when her boy brought your letter saying that she had been made distributor. She thought at first that she could not accept, as her time was so occupied. I told her she had better not accept. There was no more said about it then, but before she went home she said: "I have got to accept; it is placed upon me," and then I knew she had been praying to know her duty. She had not asked for help, but another sent her name to you. A more worthy woman never lived. She took up the work you assigned her and it seemed as though she never took a moment's rest until she was taken down sick. She has found out so many needy ones, that she has even taken some of her own slender means to give to them. She is a member of the Women's Relief Corps, W. C. T. U., County Superintendent of Jail Work and a wonderful Christian character.

Rhoda A. Greenslit, of Baraboo, Wis., writes that she has received letters telling of great suffering among families living near Poplar Bluff, S.D., and a lady resident at Yankton, writes;

We have consumed everything, and have no money, and no feed for our horses, and no seed. I do not know what we will do. We can sell nothing we have, because everyone is in the same condition. This country is full of horses, and no feed, only what can be bought. The State is doing nothing for the people. The loan offices are besieged with people getting loans, nearly all adding to the incumbrance which was already fastened upon their land. Heretofore we have always been able to borrow money upon our chattels, but now there is no one who will loan on our chattels or accounts. We have not been able to buy any clothing or shoes, but have worn out every old thing we had. I do not know what we will do for clothing, as the cold will set so they will not hang on the best. When I state my case I am trying to have you understand, that a large per cent. of this county are in the same fix.

This letter has been forwarded to one of our distributors with a special request to make an effort to relieve the most urgent cases in the writer's neighborhood.

Appeals from Oklahoma and South Dakota are still numerous. H. J. Lamb, of Stillwater, S. D. (one of our Volunteer Distributors), after detailing his relief work in the distribution of clothing and money from the Fund, adds that when spring comes the worst time will then be experienced in his section. Owing to the very general distress, many have been driven to acts of lawlessness, stealing provisions to supply the cravings of hunger. S. Elwell, Ramsey, S. D., writes that not one quarter of the people in his neighborhood have seed-grain or feed; and similar urgent appeals come from Mrs. L. C. G. Drakola, and J. S. Smith, Bonesteel, S. D. The latter makes application in behalf of the Gregory County Aid Society and declares that unless substantial relief comes soon great suffering will result. Fifteen hundred persons are destitute in Gregory County alone.

A MISSIONARY HEROINE.*

THE first earthquake occurred very near midnight on March 28th and woke us up with a vengeance, being the worst we ever had, the earth heaving so awfully that we expected every moment to be swallowed up, and were almost paralyzed with terror, but Minn and Frank slept through it all. After it a tremendous rush of the sea seemed to take place, from the noise it made, all which we found next morning was the case, carrying our boat from where it lay high and dry about one hundred yards inland, also canoes, two of which were smashed. I lay in awful terror after the earthquake till three o'clock, and was dropping off to sleep, when another terrible one set us flying out of the house in our nightgowns—John dragging the children out of their beds, and the girls rushing out of their house. There was not a breath of wind, and it was awful to see in the bright moonlight the green trunks of the trees swaying back and forward, and to feel the ground going to and fro with such force. We had three or two slight ones after that, and then got at daybreak an awful repetition—every one of us simultaneously rushing out of doors! This was number five; and we had no more violent shocks ere we got home, making seven in all before breakfast, after which we had a commotion of another kind.

John felt so exhausted and had just got off asleep on the study sofa (a most unusual occurrence with him), when I heard high words between Taia, one of our church members, and Nalihi, an Erromangan. I knew not what to do, for natives never waste time on high words—they at once rush to arms; and I was unwilling to wake John to more excitement, as it was exactly just day two years since he had been seized with that awful fever, and I had been in fear of its return, as people predicted it would, about the same time of the year. I always had a foolish terror of a loaded musket anywhere, and infinitely more so in the hands of an enraged savage and I went between the combatants myself.

Nalihi was flourishing his musket in Taia's face, as an accompaniment to an eloquent harangue he was delivering in Erromangan, not being able to speak Aniwan; and Taia, who understood and could speak perfectly, seemed to be paying him back with interest. I took no notice of the Erromangan, knowing my only chance was with Taia; so I went over to him, and implored him not to utter another word, whatever provocation he might receive; and though reluctant at first, he behaved nobly and stood what I think few white men would have done in the same circumstances. I kept close beside him all the time; and though for three-quarters of an hour the other stood heaping insults upon him, and at last in his rage cut down his bananas and fences before his eyes, he never spoke, though his muscles twitched and he clutched at his great club sometimes. When I thought Taia was going to give way I put my cold white paw (it did feel so), on his black arm, and every time I did so he turned and looked down at me with a grim smile, saying, "Dont fear, Missi; I'll not speak."

Feeling my own strength could not hold out much longer, I sped off and brought John, who quietly went up to Nalihi and relieved him of his musket and axe (oh, I was glad to see that musket in dear old John's trusty paws, for Nalihi held it in a horizontal position, and it always would point it at me the whole time I stood there!) clapped him on the shoulder, and had him sobbing like a child in a minute and offering payment to Taia for the damage done—which, however, Taia was too seriously offended to receive, and I do not wonder at it.

We had three more earthquakes that day, but slight, making ten in all: and I took care at night to provide for emergencies by putting a supply of blankets on the verandah, as there is not a moment to snatch clothes when they come and we had felt chilly the night before. I got laughed at for what was termed my needless precaution; but we had hardly got into our first sleep, when another violent earthquake turned us out, and we were thankful for them. It was not so bad as some, however, and we got a sleep till morning without further disturbance, as the grand performance did not come off till next evening at nine o'clock.

THEY THAT WAIT FOR HIM.

Warnings and Encouragements to Christ's Waiting People in his Messages by John to the Seven Churches.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

A GREAT and solemn perplexity meets those whom God has awakened by his Spirit through the Scriptures to look for, to wait for, to be ready for the coming of their Lord. Before our beloved Lord left his disciples, he said to them, "Let not your heart be troubled," and gave them as the special reason why: "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and will receive you unto myself." (John 14:3). No word about anything that must first take place before he comes. His one injunction to them was to be ready, for in such an hour as they thought not he would come; it might be at any hour, evening, midnight, cock-crowing, morning. (Matt. 24: 40-43; Mark 13: 32-37; Luke 12: 35-40; 21:34-36).

Consistently with his Lord, Paul in his epistles insists on, and commands an unceasing watchfulness, and expectation of the coming of the Lord. (I Cor. 1: 7, 8; Phil. 1: 6, 10; 2: 16; 3: 20, 21; Col. 3: 4; I Thes. 1: 9, 10; 2: 19; 3: 13; 4: 13-18; 5: 1-11, 23; II Thes. 1: 2; 3: 5; II Tim. 4: 3, etc.) And yet, more than eighteen hundred years have elapsed, and Christ is not yet come! Here is the difficulty, and scoffers taking advantage of this, say as the apostle Peter prophesied they would: "Where is the promise of his coming?"

When the apostle Paul fell asleep, he knew he was being "poured out as a drink offering" for the church. But he knew also that his love for the Lord's appearance which never flagged till the moment of his departure, (II Tim. 4: 6-8, R.V. margin) had not been in vain, and that his earnest, intense longing, if by any means he might attain to the out-resurrection from among the dead (Phil. 3: 11), was an already answered prayer. He knew that personally he should make one of those who should not be preceded by those which are alive, and remain, and shall be "caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air." He should be one of the dead in Christ which rise first. (I Thes. 4: 15-17). And this leads to the trenchant question upon which all hangs: Will all believers be caught up to meet the Lord in the air at one and the same time? According to I Cor. 15: 50-59 and this passage in I Thes. 4, no distinction whatever is made, and if the Word of God had closed with the epistles, such a question could not have been raised.

But the Church of Christ, born of the Spirit, and baptized by the Spirit into one body (I Cor. 12: 13) at Pentecost, has not, as a whole been making herself ready (Rev. 19: 7); the majority of her children have not really and practically in their life and spirit been sitting with Christ in heavenly places (Eph. 2: 6); their citizenship has not been in heaven (Phil. 3: 20 R.V.), but down on earth. And yet the Lord can wed no unprepared Bride! And Scripture clearly shows us that his coming is contingent on the preparedness of them that wait for him.

All is waiting until the church or the overcomers in the church are so far conformed to the image of God's Son (Rom. 8: 29) that the Lord shall be justified in taking them away to be united to him and reign with him as his Bride. Then, the great purpose of this age being accomplished, and "a people for his name" taken out from the Gentiles (Acts 15: 14), he can come with these gathered saints, and, by judgments, cleanse the earth, and establish his reign.

Our Lord, when he left this world, gave the promise of the Holy Spirit who should guide into all truth . . . and "declare unto you the things that are to come" (John 16: 13). But the church did not follow the Spirit. The Spirit was grieved, and ceased to declare things to come. The imminent coming of the Lord ceased to be a living expectation, the children of God declined from the zeal and disinterestedness of Pentecost and settled down in some measure upon the earth instead of maintaining a citizenship in heaven. How could Christ take away such a church and make her his Bride? All the apostles but one were already asleep in Jesus. There was one then left, John of whom the Lord Jesus had said to Peter: "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" (John 21: 23). He was banished to the isle of Patmos, not by the will of man, however much man may have been instrumental in his banishment, but "for the Word of God and the testimony of Jesus."

CHRIST'S YOKE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Mar. 31. Matt. 11: 28-30; John 14: 14, 15.

WHILE the cross is the universally accepted emblem of Christianity, the idea of the Christian life which Christ labored to instil into the minds of his followers would be more accurately represented by the symbol of the yoke. The cross is precious, for it is by the cross that the Christian enters the new life. It means deliverance and safety. It means self-denial and death to the world's allurements. But the Christian has not learned his whole lesson until he has made the idea of the yoke the rule and principle of his life. It implies obedience and it implies service. We make our boast of liberty, but there are occasions when we glory in surrendering it. The workman who toils in the erection of some great building does not follow his own ideas of architecture, but obeys the architect who has drawn the plans. He may not see the relation of the part he is doing to the great edifice, but the architect knows and he trusts him. When he sees the completion, he glories in the part he did in mechanical obedience. So it is in war. No victory would be gained if the soldier did not yield himself almost as a slave to the direction of his general. He is not informed of the general's plans; he has not to follow his own impulses or notions of the campaign. He has simply to do his duty and to obey orders. The sailor's life is on the same pattern. The captain lays out the course and the sailor follows it blindly. Christ asks his followers to act on the same principle. And though in theory it is reasonable, the practice is very difficult. To give up the will and the direction of one's own life; to bear one's plans being thwarted; to see some cherished scheme which has cost thought and time come to naught; to see good fail and evil triumph—all this is distressing. But he who has taken on him the yoke of Christ is being guided and has learned to accept guidance. Then, too, the yoke means service. No man is saved for himself alone. The branch which is in the vine will bear fruit. If no fruit comes from it the branch is unprofitable, good only for burning. In the great battle between good and evil in the world there ought to be no skulkers in Christ's livery. Every generation ought to show an advance in the number of followers of Christ, and to do that involves effort on the part of the weakest of Christ's subjects. Each one has an influence on some others, an influence none can exert so effectively as he. If he bears the yoke, he will pull and strain and exert himself in Christ's interests, whatever may be his position in life. As a Christian—a Christ's man—he will strive to promote the kingdom of his Lord. And the reward is sure. There is rest in the soul. The harass and worry and fret goes out of life in that service. Sweet peace rules and reigns in heart and life, and the yoke is found to be easy and the burden light.

THE EPWORTH LEAGUE IN INDIA.

The progress of the League in India is very satisfactory. The "Indian Witness" reports enthusiastic reunions both at Bombay and Hyderabad. At the former the chair was occupied by Rev. W. H. Stephens, the President of the League. He introduced Rev. J. O. Denning who spoke of "The League as a training school for workers." Rev. C. G. Elsam then told of his experience with "The League as an evangelizing and temperance agency." Miss Abrams was equally emphatic in her testimony as to the efficient way in which the League helped in educational work. Rev. H. A. Crane followed with another aspect of the League as an encouragement to the feeling of enthusiastic fidelity among the young people to the church. The conference committee's report showed fourteen chapters of the League and six Junior departments organized with 721 members. Seven of the chapters in this conference are in connection with the English work, four in Hindustani, two in Marathi, and one in Gujarati.

The reunion at Hyderabad took more of a social character, but its spirit was thoroughly permeated with League fellowship. Three hundred people filled the spacious M. E. Church, and at the close of the literary and musical exercises, adjourned to a large shamiana in the church compound to discuss cakes and coffee.

Besides selections of sacred music by the choir, and suitable recitations by juvenile members, and a crisp address of welcome by Vice-President Ross, short interesting papers were read on: "A Methodist Retrospect in India," by the President; "Some Plants of the Bible and their Symbolical Meaning," by Miss Xavier; "Gems from Bryant, Longfellow, Tennyson and Whittier, illustrating Christian Truth," by Miss Wood. Also a couple of lively readings, entitled: "The Origin and History of the League," by Mr. H. Martin and "Some very Ignorant People" (John Ploughman), by Dr. J. Martin.

The reunion was voted an all-around success by all. The brethren praise God for the work and influence of the League in Hyderabad.

A UNIVERSITY Y. M. C. A.

In no department is the Young Men's Christian Association a more necessary institution than in the places where young men are receiving higher education. They will naturally be the leaders in the coming generation, for education is sure to tell, and increasingly so with the advance of the country in age and development. It is therefore of the greatest importance that every influence in the direction of spiritual growth that can be brought to bear upon them while they are gaining secular education, should be used. The Young Men's Christian Association has proved its value in this respect. The work, however, must of necessity be difficult owing to the constantly changing character of the constituency from which its members are drawn. The most earnest and enthusiastic members of the Y. M. C. A. in a university drop from membership at the end of their course and their places have to be filled with the newcomers. It is gratifying, therefore, to find that so much interest in Association work is being taken by one of our southern institutions of learning. The University of Tennessee at Knoxville, of which a picture appears on this page, has set apart a convenient room for the use of its Association, and the privilege appears to be thoroughly appreciated by the undergraduates. Of the 253 students in the University, 143 have connected themselves with the Association, and of these, eighty-five have qualified for active membership. The Association has a small and well selected library of its own and holds regular Bible Classes and missionary meetings.

B. Y. P. U. NOTES.

An enthusiastic district conference of the Illinois Baptist Young People's Unions has been held at Peoria. This was the second of the series planned by the Executive Committee State Union. Pastor Kirtley of the First Baptist Church in which the Conference was held proved a graceful and cordial host, welcoming the delegates with hearty words of good cheer. He greeted them as fellow-workers, fellow-learners and fellow-builders and took them to his heart in each capacity. The Christian Culture Courses are evidently taking an ever deepening hold on the members and they received a large share of the attention of the Conference. Pastor Clatworthy of Canton spoke on the Sacred Literature Course and his bright pointed utterances seemed to stir the enthusiasm of his hearers. He showed what a grand and noble field of study it opened up, stimulating and inspiring every earnest student. Pastor W.L.Riley of Fairbury dealt with the Missionary Conquest Course and found abundant material there for eloquent and stirring appeals. Pastor Wrightnour of Lincoln discussed the Bible study course and showed by several illustrations, which would have been amusing if they had not been so sad, how sorely the course is needed even by college-bred men who seem to neglect the one Book which best repays study. Mrs. H. S. Black of Kewanee gave an encouraging report of the Junior work and showed how strong a claim it had on the sympathy and support of the seniors. Dr. R. F. Y. Pierce of Rockford, one of the earliest and most devoted of B. Y. P. U. workers closed the Conference with an earnest and thrilling address on Denominational loyalty.——One of the benefits of Mr. Dickerson's installation at Headquarters is already being experienced in Dr. F. L. Wilkins, the General Secretary being set free to take an extensive Eastern tour. From the first it has been obvious to onlookers that Dr. Wilkins should not be kept tied to the editorial desk and so prevented visiting the Unions, and giving them good advice and stimulating talks which he does know how to do. Dr. Wilkins has been cordially welcomed in New York, Brooklyn, Boston and other cities and has made many friends. Dr. Wilkins is now on his way to South Dakota speaking at various cities on his way.——Rev. Frank S. Dobbins of 1420 Chestnut street, Philadelphia will be pleased to send to any applicant writing to him and enclosing a stamp, a list of the best books on the Missionary and other topics useful to members who are following the Christian Culture Courses.—Denver, Colo., is systematically organizing to secure the convention of 1897. It is sending a strong delegation to Baltimore. Brooklyn, N.Y., is also asking for the convention. It expects to contribute five hundred of the fifteen hundred delegates that New York State will send to Baltimore. At the recent rally in the Noble St. Church most encouraging reports were received from the Unions in the various churches.

THE KING'S DAUGHTERS OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Probably no one knew, until the Boston Convention of the Order, how much religious and philanthropic work was being done by the King's Daughters of the Old Bay State. Reports coming to headquarters from scattered Circles show that even the convention did not give anything like a full idea of the unostentatious ministrations of these kindly ladies who work "In His Name." Here is the report, for instance, of a Circle at Wrentham. The Secretary, Miss Helen G. Hood, writes: "We are a Circle of girls, organized August, 1892. Our first work was clothing some poor children that they might come to Sunday School. Since then we have helped the Church Building Society, a poor family in Boston, the Fresh Air Fund, and some needy ones in our own town. Last June we sent $25 from our treasury for the starting of a Sunday School in the West, and we are now working to get the necessary funds to provide an Indian girl an education. Nearly every week a committee of two girls has visited the sick and helped to brighten their lives. Every Thursday during the summer we send flowers to the Flower Mission in Boston. It is with joy and gratitude that we begin to realize what concentrated effort can do for Christ."

Another characteristic report comes from a Circle in Lynn, of which Miss Carrie E. Henderson is Secretary. She says: "Since our organization we have aided in various ways forty families, besides doing sewing for the district nurse, giving articles of clothing to the Home Missionary barrel, and sending old cotton to the hospital. One feature of our work is to provide suitable clothing for children who otherwise would be unable to attend our Sunday School. During the recent business depression our work has been especially helpful, as families who disliked the thought of receiving charity have received friendly and substantial aid from the Circle, the name of such families being unknown except to the member who discovered the case. We assisted in paying a young woman's board seven weeks. Our work been interesting and delightful."

AMONG THE ORDERS.

Two Christian Endeavor societies were organized during January in Protestant Episcopal churches in Philadelphia. They were the first cases of the kind in that city.

During 1894 the Christian Endeavor Societies contributed to the American Board $10,673, and to the Woman's Board $6,98 a large gain over the returns of the previous year.

An authoritative statement is made that the entire cost of the administration of the Epworth League last year was $7,771.3 This includes the salary of the Secretary and the travelling expenses of him and the Cabinet and the Board of Control.

The King's Daughters have now a free bed in the Grace Hospital, Toronto, the occupant of which receives attendance and the privileges free of charge. Any Canadian King's Daughter who needs hospital treatment is eligible for admission.

Homes of Swedish Lapland.

They are in lovely Valleys, beside rushing Fjords or steep Mountains, but are full of Life and Happiness.

THOUGH Lapland contains great reaches of desolate moor and dreary swamp, still there are many parts of the country that have a quiet and rugged beauty of their own, such as is found nowhere in Europe, except possibly in some sections of the Alps. In Swedish Lapland, the long, narrow mountain lakes and brawling streams add greatly to the picturesque charm, and tend to diversify the industries of the people, who call their country "Sabme" and themselves "Samelats"—Finnish terms, signifying "dark." Lapland, or "the land of the Lapps," is not a recognized geographical term, as it includes the northern part of Norway, Sweden and Finland, and a part of the government of Archangel. The most southerly and salubrious section is Swedish Lapland, but a large proportion of the people are exceedingly poor, especially those who dwell in the mountain districts, like the group shown in our illustration. The fisher Lapps who live on the coast, are active, energetic and prosperous; but the hunters, who, with the mountaineers, are the true representatives of the race, are of a nomadic disposition and wander from point to point, rarely owning more than a few reindeer and some hunting traps. These hunters make their headquarters in "njallas" or small wooden houses, raised above the ground on piles, and they only leave them when out on hunting expeditions in the mountains, or busy in the pastures among the herds in summer. At such times the women are left at home alone to tend cattle and keep house. In April or May, the reindeer, which have been herded all the winter are turned loose to wander at will, and immediately after midsummer they are again driven back to the herding-grounds.

A FARMER'S FAMILY IN SWEDISH LAPLAND

Among the Swedish Lapps, a fair proportion are farmers. Although the men are somewhat stolid-looking, owing to their hard, monotonous life, many of the women have bright, intelligent faces. Their dress is peculiar, being an odd jumble of Swedish and Arctic, with a suggesstion of the Dutch peasant. The cradle of a Lapp baby (as seen in the illustration), is one that would surprise and interest most American mothers who would be puzzled to know why anyone could have devised an affair so clumsy and uncomfortable-looking. This deer-skin bag, held together by thongs and stuffed with wool or warm woollen garments, makes the ideal Lapp crib for an infant, and is rocked and swung on the mother's knee to the croon of a lullaby that soon soothes the little occupant to slumber.

Dwarfish in stature, stoutly built, with straight, black hair, small eyes and swarthy, yellowish complexions, the Lapps are a quiet and inoffensive people. Probably nowhere can a more peaceable and law-abiding people be found, and it is a matter of record that crimes of violence are almost unknown among them. Nearly all have been Christianized and a majority belong to some Protestant denomination or are members of the Greek Church. In the parish churches divine services are held in the Lappish, Swedish and Finnish languages, and during the summer months clergymen from the south visit the mountain Lapps or Fjell-Lappar-Finner, and preach to them the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Although the Christianization of the nation began in 1275, when a part of the territory was annexed to Sweden, religious and educational progress was slow and it was not until the reign of Gustavus I. that the first school was established. The last remnants of Lappish paganism were extirpated in the early part of the seventeenth century. Now, despite some traces of old-time superstitions and beliefs, the Christian religion has a strong hold in the hearts of the people and the "Samelats," as they prefer to be called, have among them many who live simple yet spiritual lives and whose example and influence are a blessing to others.

WHAT'S THE USE!

WHAT is the use of sighing?
Just as cheap to laugh.
What is the use of crying?
Just as cheap to chaff
Song will sweeten sorrow,
Sun will rise to-morrow,
And relief you borrow
For a guiding staff.

What's the use of fretting
When the clouds hang low?
What's the use of getting
Just step out and hustle.
Brains and brawny muscle
Always stand a show.

What's the use of moping?
Doesn't pay the rent.
What's the use of groping
In your tenement?
Though the skies are grieving
And the birds are leaving,
Standing up for achieving.
Never be content.

Teach the Girls Method.

Our children should be impressed with the value of time and method, even in their earliest years. A girl cannot begin too soon after she is in her teens to learn household management. The happiness of a whole household in the future, and her honor and dignity, may depend largely upon a knowledge of these common every-day affairs, more than on a knowledge of the dead languages. But there is time for both if only the girls will think about it. It is a notable fact that the busiest people have always the most time to help others, simply because they know pretty well what they have to do and how long it will take them, and arrange their work accordingly. Methodical people will get through three times the amount of work that unmethodical people can. And a girl who has no method about anything will by and by find little time for even the most important duties of life, and none to devote to the things of eternity.

Children's Laughter.

In all the world there is nothing sweeter to the ear or pleasanter to the heart than the free, joyous laughter of an innocent child. Some parents, whose children have "passed on" before them to the brighter land, may not be able to remember a single tone of the loved ones' voices, but oh! how clearly they recall their laughter—the sparkling eyes and the merry, ringing peals that set the echoes flying, woke up all the silences of the house, and was like a burst of vocal sunshine. How dull the home is wherein its music has once joyously echoed, but now is heard no more. How still is the house when the little ones are fast asleep and their pattering feet are silent. How easily the fun of a child bubbles forth. Let the little ones laugh; too soon, alas! they may find cause enough to weep. Don't try to silence them, but let their gleefulness ring out a gladsome peal, reminding us of the days when we, too, could laugh without a sigh.

"Real Girls."

After all, there is no danger, even amid all our so-called "modern progress," that the best qualities of young manhood or womanhood will die out. There are just as many "real women" to-day as "real men," if not more—we mean the true unaffected, natural sort who have a way of winning all hearts by their simple straightforwardness and delightfully unpretentious yet captivating character. When we see one of these girls we usually find her bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked, and with a healthy interest in those about her that keeps temptation far away. She is her mother's companion, her father's comfort; comrade to sisters and brothers, and frequently the admiration of her "fashionable friends," who cannot understand why she is so cheerful. They try in vain to fathom the mystery of her peculiar charm, for the young men admire her even if her hair hasn't been tortured into the very latest impossible kink to wave. She isn't always stylish, and her dressmaking is often done by an unpretending seamstress on a side street where fashionable woman never come.

CHILDHOOD'S ROMANCES.

OF late years, there has been a strong tendency among literary investigators, to invade the realm of childhood and break down some of its most cherished idols. These iconoclasts, for instance, have discovered that many of the wonderful romances that have charmed the childish imagination of the English-speaking races for centuries, are either absurd or unoriginal. Thus, the delightful tales that have transformed the nursery into an enchanted pleasure-ground and have held countless hosts of little auditors spellbound and fascinated, are attacked in the three vital points of their integrity, their originality and their authenticity. These investigators assure us that, long ages ago, when the Saxon race was utterly barbarian, the children of China, Egypt and other ancient countries of the globe, were entertained and amused by the same stories, although dealing with different characters and different surroundings. Thus the "Red Riding-Hood," "Puss-in-Boots," "Bo-peep," and other familiar characters fade from our own acquaintanceship and resolve themselves into hazy and indistinct heroines, sprites, gnomes and fairies, who peopled far-off plains and valleys long before Europe had a nursery literature of its own.

One cherished favorite, however, has escaped the general disaster. It is the venerable tale of "Mother Goose," and it is proved to have been of American origin. Rev. J. W. Manning, D.D., writes:

Mother Goose is no myth, as some have thought, but lived in Boston in veritable flesh and blood, as the records of Old South Church clearly show. The maiden name of this venerable lady was Elizabeth Foster. She lived in Charleston, where she was born, until her marriage. Then she came to Boston with her thrifty husband, Isaac Goose. She was his second mate, and began her maternal life as a stepmother to ten children. These all seem to have been lively little goslings, and to their number she rapidly added six more. Poor, happy Mother Goose! No wonder her feelings were too many for her, and that she poured them out in the celebrated lines:

There was an old woman who lived in a shoe,
She had so many children, she didn't know what to do.

Yet her family cares, seem on the whole, to have rested lightly on her. She survived Father Goose many years, and she led and fed her numerous flock and tenderly brooded them in the little enclosure on Temple Place till they were able to swim and forage for themselves. One daughter, Elizabeth, became the wife of Thomas Fleet, a printer, of Pudding Lane, and when a son was born to Thomas Fleet, Mother Goose insisted on going to live with them, as nurse to his son and heir. To coddle her own grandchild was the ideal of blessedness to Mother Goose. She sang ditties from morning till night, till her son-in-law become sensibly alarmed at the fertility of her genius. Fleet wrote down what he could of the rhymes which fell from her lips. His notes rapidly accumulated, and in a little while he had enough to make a volume. These he printed and bound into a book, which he offered for sale. Her little book made her name a household word and dear to the children of the English-speaking world.

Sickness Among Children, is prevalent at all seasons of the year, but can be avoided largely when they are properly cared for. Infant Health is the title of a valuable pamphlet accessible to all who will send address to the N. Y Condensed Milk Co., N. Y. City.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER II. (Continued.)

THE atmosphere in the office of Messrs. Mapleton & Jackson was becoming decidedly explosive. Mr. Jackson had calculated on Fred's ignominious dismissal without inquiry and his fury was ungovernable when he saw Fred not only vindicate himself from the accusation, but in doing so become his accuser. That he should be charged by a clerk with misappropriation of funds and falsification of the books of the firm was in his eyes an unpardonable outrage. As he stood glaring at Fred, he was fast losing self-control, which was never a strong element in his character.

Fred stood unmoved, and his calmness appeared to exasperate the angry man. He seized Fred roughly by the collar to turn him out of the office. It was an unwise thing to do, for Fred was young and strong and was now indignant. He threw up his arm to remove Mr. Jackson's clutch, and gave that gentleman a push that sent him in a heap into the corner. Mr. Mapleton, who had been staring first at one and then at the other in a bewildered way, now sprang to his feet.

"Why, bless my soul! Fred, leave this office." Fred bowed to Mr. Mapleton and left. "Why, what does it all mean? But really I can't blame the boy after all. Are you much hurt, Jackson? You brought it all on yourself. What have you against the boy, anyway? Why, whoever saw such work! Your nose is bleeding. The young villain! But you had no business to talk in that way. I swear, I'd have done it myself when I was his age if anyone had called me a liar."

Mr. Jackson gathered himself together and slowly arose to his feet; his face was something fearful to look at. Save the dark rings already showing around his eyes, his face was a ghastly white, and his bloodshot eyes told the malignant thoughts behind them. He hissed through his blood-stained lips: "My turn will come; I will crush him as I would a snake beneath my feet."

"No, Jackson, you won't do anything of the kind," said Mr. Mapleton. "I have dismissed Fred, though I don't think I have treated him fair myself, for I'd have done just as he has when I was young, but I don't see what you have against him, and you are not going to harm him unless you want to quarrel with me too."

That afternoon Mr. Mapleton was taken ill, and had to be taken home in a cab from his office to his home, as he was too ill to wait for his own carriage.

CHAPTER III.

A Parting Warning.

There was great commotion in the Mapleton mansion that night. Mrs. Mapleton had been in bed all the afternoon with a sick headache; Alice moped about the house with red eyes, and now Mr. Mapleton was brought home very ill indeed. The doctor told them that the case was serious, so other things were forgotten in their anxiety for the husband and father. That night Mr. Mapleton seemed very anxious to see Fred, and at last, at his urgent request, Will was dispatched to find him if possible.

When Fred was ushered into the sick room the old gentleman's eyes brightened, and he held out his hand, which Fred took in both of his, as he said: "My dearest and best friend, I hope my actions have had nothing to do with this illness."

"No, my boy, I have felt it coming on for some time; but I was anxious to see you and tell you, that I don't believe a word about anything they have hinted as to your dishonesty."

"Thank you, sir," said Fred. "You may rest assured that you are the last man I [illegible]"

"And, Fred, I want to say, altho' perhaps it is wrong for an old man to say it, but I think you acted right this afternoon and convinced Jackson that it is not simply money that makes the man, or the gentleman. And Fred, I fear that all is not right with Jackson, or why was he so anxious for you to leave? But you must not go, you are the only one I have to depend on, and I think, perhaps, my wife was too hasty, and I, too; she is a proud woman, but you may be a great man yet."

Fred shook his head. He said: "I am sorry to say that I cannot remain; I could not afford to be idle so I have already accepted an engagement as super-cargo and the ship sails for Mexico to-morrow; but I hope you may soon be better, and, Mr. Mapleton, do not think that I speak in a spirit of revenge, or to repay Mr. Jackson for having insulted me, when I say that there is cause why you should be more watchful in the details of your business—but you are too ill, I will talk with your son."

Mr. Mapleton was too exhausted to say more; Fred kissed the white hand of the sick man and withdrew to the hall.

There he met Mrs. Mapleton, and as she was about to pass without speaking, Fred stopped her and said: "Madam, I am going away in the morning to Mexico, and know not when I may return, and I should like to ask your forgiveness, if I have offended you before I go."

"It is indignation, burning indignation, that I feel, sir, toward you, and you speak lightly when you speak of offending me, but perhaps you think it is a light affair when you come between a mother and her only daughter, and are the cause of the first estrangement they have ever had. Your unprecedented presumption has nearly broken poor Alice's heart, and destroyed the peace of our happy home; for, of course, she knows that such an outrageous alliance would never be permitted, or thought of, for one moment, by any member of the family beside herself."

"Say, mother," said Will Mapleton, who entered the hall at this moment, "you are not acting like yourself in being so harsh to Fred. Father has made up with him, and I think he would like Fred to see Alice to bid her good-bye; and let us all part friends. I think this is but fair to Alice."

"Well, your sister's welfare, honor, and happiness are, I suppose, as dear to you as to me; you can do as you think best."

"That's like yourself, mother," said Will as he kissed her.

They passed. Mrs. Mapleton pretended not to see Fred's outstretched hand, but with a bow, her head turged over her shoulder and her eyes fixed on the cornice, she passed up the stairs.

Will opened the sitting-room door and looked in—"Here, Sis, is Fred come to say good-bye." Then to Fred, "You will find me in the library; I want to see you before you go," and with that left him at the door.

Fred passed in, and in a moment Alice was in his arms, and sobbing on his breast.

"Oh! you are are not going away," she cried. "You must not go."

Poor Fred held her to his breast, and stroked her golden brown hair. "I know, love, it is cruel, but we must be brave. I would not go just now when I fear my presence may be needful, if I could help it, but I have a great battle to fight, and it seemed providential to me to me when I received the offer from Sage & Co. to go. The super-cargo was taken suddenly ill, and they offered me the place. I might have sought for months before I could have found such an opening, and I must go to-morrow. Now, my pet, I have promised your mother not to renew my suit until I can meet you as an equal, so we cannot correspond; but I will try to let you know how I am getting on. Can you trust in me, come what may?"

"I will never doubt you, but will believe you true, and will love you, and only you, while I live," sobbed Alice.

I need not recount all that was said nor how many times they said good-bye, but I know that Will was out of patience and beginning to get angry when Fred appeared at the library door. As they left the house some one was seen to creep away from the sitting-room window and dodge down a side street. Fred watched until the figure passed a lamp and turning to Will, asked: "Do you know who that was?"

"No!" said Will.

"It was Jackson," said Fred.

"What in the world is he sneaking about the place for? It might have been well for us if you had broken his neck when you flung him into the corner to-day," said Will, "though it is well for you that you did not."

"Will, I tell you candidly, I believe that man to be a scoundrel, and you must keep a watch on him or he will ruin you and yours. Your father has had such confidence in the man that he now has nearly everything in his own hands; he has by one pretext and another, got rid of the old clerks and has employed creatures of his own. He has persuaded your father to transfer the law business of the firm from the old law firm to one of which his brother is head, and a firm without any reputation except for shady transactions."

"Why, Fred, you astonish me," said Will; "have you given father a hint?"

"I have only had my own eyes opened within a few days," said Fred, "and I had no opportunity of speaking to your father until to-night. You must look into the business as soon as your father gets well; and, Will, do not think me impertinent, but if your father is not soon better, persuade him to authorize you to take your mother's and sister's diamonds and other personal valuables from the safe and take them to the house or to some safe deposit."

"Certainly I will! You make cold chills run down my back, I wish I knew more about the business," said Will.

"And one thing more I want to mention, Will,if anything,(which God forbid) should happen to your father, and things should look suspicious, go to the man whose address is on this card, and put the case in his hands; he is a friend of mine, and one of the best detectives on the continent. I do not know how long I shall be gone, but I hope I shall find everything all right on my return."

They had now reached the wharf and stood shaking hands, "I am sorry to see you go," said Will,"and remember old boy, that I am your friend and you must write to me often, but do not put anything in your letters that you would not like Sis to see, for I sometimes let her read my letters."

Fred had hard work to keep back the tears as he said, "God bless you, Will," and ran up the gang-plank.

CHAPTER IV.

A Menace.

This is a world of change; nothing remains long as it was. No one knows what a day may bring forth; the bright, blue sky of the morning may be black with thunder clouds in the afternoon; the gentle zephyr that rocks the flower may change in an hour into the cyclone, leaving wreck and desolation in its track. The sound of merry laughter and sweet music may be changed into cries of pain in a minute.

Such a change took place in the Mapleton mansion. Where a week ago all was bright, beautiful and gay, and only the sound of sweet music or rippling laughter was heard, now all was gloom, darkness and despair, and only the sounds of weeping and lamentations were heard.

Mr. Mapleton was dead and buried; Mrs. Mapleton was completely prostrated, unable to leave her bed and unconscious most of the time; poor Alice showed more courage than any of them; she buried her own sorrows in her heart and bravely tried to stem the wave of destruction that was sweeping down upon them, and to comfort and care for her helpless mother.

Will was nearly crazy; he found himself at the head of the house, and it was tumbling about his ears; he had remembered Fred's advice and before his father died, had gone to the office with an order from his father, and the combination of the safe, and was told by the book-keeper that the combination had been changed to guard against a certain suspicious character who knew it, and that only Mr. Jackson knew the new one.

The business was in such a state that the only thing that seemed to be known to a certainty was that Mr. Mapleton died a bankrupt.

Will went to the old lawyers, but they could do nothing; even the life insurance in favor of Mrs. Mapleton appeared to have been transferred to Mr. Jackson.

Mrs. Mapleton had no knowledge of having signed the transfer, but had signed many papers which Mr. Jackson had brought to her during her husband's illness and, as she had full confidence in him, she had signed every paper he presented; in some instances without reading them.

The valuables from the safe were demanded and Will was thunder struck when told that they had been removed by Mr. Mapleton before his last illness.

Mr. Jackson continued to persecute poor Alice with his suit even in these days of her deep sorrow and perplexity. He called one afternoon saying that he had business of importance to transact with Miss Alice, who met him in the parlor. She received him very coolly, for she felt in her heart that he was the cause of all their troubles; so she simply bowed, motioned him to a seat and asked his business.

He said he had called to tell her how deeply he sympathized with her in her great loss; how sorry he was that Mr. Mapleton had not taken his advice; that all that he had saved himself from utter ruin in the crash were certain outside investments he had made; how he had tried to get Mr. Mapleton to go into these speculations with him, but he refused.

"And now, Miss Alice, I have come again to make a last proposition; if you will become my wife, I think I can at least save your home, for you and your mother." He approached her and tried to take her hand, Alice sprang to her feet, she was very pale and her eyes fairly flashed.

"How dare you come to me with such a proposition, and at such a time? If the place is honestly ours, it is so whether I accept the proposition or not, if it is not ours by right, I do not see how my becoming your wife can make it so, unless I am to understand you to mean that you have the power to cheat somebody out of the property.—Us, if it is ours, and I do not assent to your proposition; the rightful owner, if I do assent. Your proposition is dishonest and contemptible, and let me tell you to your face, and I hope for the last time, that I would rather beg my bread and live in a garret than become your wife."

Mr. Jackson's face became purple with rage; the veins stood out like cords on his forehead, his eyes fairly gleamed with exasperation as he said:

"This is my last attempt to save you, madam; if you prefer the poor-house for your poor, weak mother and yourself, why go there by all means, but remember that it was your own choice, and whatever your mother may suffer, that you and you alone are to blame. We shall meet again when your pride is humbled and you shall yet beg for what you now disdain."

"No, sir; I shall never beg for anything of the kind. You may humble me as you threaten. There is enough in our position to humble me as it stands, and I have a suspicion that you are responsible for a great deal of that. You may be able to do more and worse, but you could never bring me into any situation so humiliating as to make marriage with you a relief. Not even for my mother's sake could I marry you, and I can conceive of no stronger motive that would influence me. I do not want to give you unnecessary pain, so I must ask you not to speak to me on this subject again, for my answer would have to be the same."

"Wait, young lady, till you feel the turn of the screw. Poverty will teach you reason. You have to deal with a determined man. I have set my mind on marrying you, and I shall succeed yet. If fair means will not do, I will use foul."

"Oh, do cease threatening me. It is cruel, it is cowardly to come to me. You know I have no protector now, or you dare not do it." Alice had opened the door for Mr. Jackson to go out of the room before she said these words, and her tearful voice reached her brother Will as he passed through the hall.

"What is that, Alice?" he said. "No protector? Who is annoying you? What are you saying to my sister, Mr. Jackson? Leave the house immediately. I am her protector. Please understand that I shall not allow her to be worried. Now go, and I hope you will not darken our doors again."

"You shall not darken them yourself much longer," said the vindictive man as passed out.

HOW TO AVOID QUARRELS.

A sailor's advice to a quarrelsome family is reported by a Boston journal. It says that a fisherman from Gloucester, Mass., recently went on a voyage to Valparaiso as mate of a merchant vessel. He left behind him in his home with his wife and children, his mother and his uncle. When he returned he found that during his absence the family had bickered and quarrelled continually. They had so many complaints of each other to make to him that they could scarcely welcome him. He listened in silence, and at the first opportunity invited them all to come on board the ship on which he had made his voyage. They went and examined the vessel throughout. The women were most astonished at the size of the cabin. "How ever," they asked, "do you manage to get eight men into such a box without crowding? How do you get any peace living as close as this?" The sailor replied: "I'll tell you. Each man is willing that his neighbor shall have his own share of room and keep it. Suppose you take that rule home with you and try it there." It may be hoped they did, for it is a good rule that many Christian homes and churches might adopt with advantage. Christ's law goes still further. It requires Christians not only to refrain from encroaching on his neighbor's rights, but to submit cheerfully when his own rights are withheld. (Matt. 5: 39, 40.)

THE SAINT'S HOME.

THE saints are going one by one
To their immortal home.
Their battles fought, their victories won,
They never more shall roam.

That home is bright and free from fear,
'Tis for the saints reserved;
'Tis free from sorrow, bane and tear,
'Tis by their God preserved.

That home is past the chill of death,
'Tis on the shining shore;
'Tis past the day of fleeting breath,
'Tis theirs forevermore.

Yonkers, N. Y. JORDAN E. STORMS, JR.

FORTY-TWO OBELISKS.

There are forty-two Egyptian obelisks still in existence. Twelve of these have been removed to Rome, five are in London, and one in Central Park, New York. The tallest is that at Karnac, which is 105⅜ feet in height. It took two years to set up the one now in New York, and the one which was presented to England in the year 1801 lay prone for seventy-seven years in Britain before it was finally erected in 1878.

THE HEART'S DESIRE.

LORD in thy house I humbly bow,
Help me to worship thee aright;
O lift my heart from things below,
And let me seek thy love and light.

Dear Lord, thy face to me reveal,
Show me the path of duty true,
Help me to walk, help me to feel,
Thy love each hour in all I do.

Till to thee for all the world,
O help each one to know thy grace,
And all who would in thee behold
The beauties of thy loving face.

What's your husband's work?

Does he have to do anything as hard as your washing and scrubbing? It can't be. What can a man do that's as hard, for most men, as this constant housedrudgery is, for most women? If he has any sympathy for you, tell him to get you some Pearline. Sympathy is all very well, but it's Pearline, not sympathy, that you want for washing and cleaning. Nothing else that's safe to use will save you so much downright hard work at the washtub or about the house. It saves money, too—saves the ruinous wear on clothes and paint from needless rubbing.

We Direct Special Attention to the following Remarkable Statement:

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment.

A YEAR'S WORK AT FORDHOOK FARM (BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED)
IN this new book just published the pen and camera transport its reader to "Fordhook," the Model Seed Farm of America—in so far as such a thing is possible—by affording him a comprehensive view of it as it actually appears. Although the price is 10 cents, we will, upon receipt of two 2-cent stamps, mail a copy to any planter who desires to read it before sending this season's order for Seeds. Shall we mail you a copy now?
In addition to the many charming views of "Fordhook," it contains photographic illustrations of a unique Floral Wonder to appear in 1896—something absolutely without parallel in the annals of Horticulture. One dollar per seed would not buy a packet now; but we believe flower lovers the world over will be glad to learn, a year in advance, of the coming of the greatest novelty that has yet rewarded the scientific cultivation of flowers. 'Twill produce a profound sensation in '96, and it were wise for you to write to-day. Address, Come down in gracious power upon his people." The place was shaken with he Divine presence. As far as we could nd out, over four hundred persons were onverted that night. Hear it, all young nen entering the ministry, hear it, all Christian workers: it was the Holy Ghost.

In the Second Reformed Church of Som- rville, New Jersey, in my boyhood days, Ir. Osborne, the evangelist, came to hold special service. I see now as he stood n the pulpit. Before he announced his text, nd before he had uttered a word of his ermon, strong men wept aloud, and it was ke the Day of Judgment. It was the Holy Ghost.

In 1857 the electric telegraph bore strange nessages. One of them read, "My dear par- nts will rejoice to hear that I have found eace with God." Another read: "Dear nother: The work continues, and I, too, have been converted." Another read: "At ast, faith and peace." What was it? The Holy Ghost. In that 1857, Jaynes' Hall, Philadelphia, and Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, New York, telegraphed each oth- r the number of souls saved, and the ris- ng of the devotional tides. Noon-day prayer-meetings were held in all the cities. Ships came into harbor, captain and all the sailors saved on that voyage. Police and ire departments met in their rooms for Di- vine worship. At Albany, the Legislature of the State of New York assembled in the ooms of the Court of Appeals for religious ervices. Congressional union prayer-meet- ng was opened at Washington. From whence came the power? From the Holy Ghost. That power shook New York. That power shook America. That power shook the earth. That power could take this en- tire audience into the peace of the Gospel quicker than you could lift your eyes heav- inward. Come, Holy Ghost! Come, Holy Ghost! He has come! He is here! I feel him in my heart. There are thousands who feel him in their hearts, convicting some, saving some, sanctifying some.

The difference in evangelical usefulness is not so much a difference in brain, in scholar- ship, or elocutionary gifts, as in Holy Ghost power. You will not have much surprise at the extraordinary career of Charles G. Fin- ney as a soul-winner, if you know that soon after his conversion he had this experi- ence of the Paraclete. He says:

"As I turned, and was about to take a seat by the fire, I received a baptism of the Holy Ghost. Without any expectation of it; without ever having the thought in my mind that there was any such thing for me; without any recollection that I had ever heard the thing mentioned by any person in the world, the Holy Ghost descended upon me in a manner that seemed to go through me, body and soul. Indeed, it seemed to come in waves and waves of liquid love, for I could not express it in any other way. It seemed like the very breath of God. These waves came over me, and over me, and over me, one after the other, until I recall I cried out, 'I shall die if these waves continue to pass over me.' I said, 'Lord, I cannot bear any more.'"

Now, my hearers, let five hundred of us, whether clerical or lay workers, get such a divine visitation as that, and we could take this world for God before the clock of the next century strikes one.

How many marked instances of Holy Ghost power! When a black trumpeter took his place in Whitefield's audience pro- posing to blow the trumpet at a certain point in the service, and put everything into de- rision, somehow he could not get the trum- pet to his lips and at the close of the meet- ing he sought out the preacher and asked for his prayers. It was the Holy Ghost. What was the matter with Hedley Vicars the memorable soldier, when he sat with his Bible before him in a tent, and his de- riding comrades came in and jeered, saying: "Turned Methodist, eh?" And another said, "You hypocrite! Bad as you were I never thought you would come to this, old fellow." And then he became the soldier evangelist, and when a soldier in another regiment hundreds of miles away telegraph- ed his spiritual anxieties to Hedley Vicars, saying: "What shall I do?" Vicars tele- graphed as thrilling a message as ever went over the wires, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." What power was being felt? It was the Holy Ghost. And what more appropriate? for the Holy Ghost is a "tongue of fire," and the electricity that flies along the wires is a tongue of fire. And that reminds me of what I might do now. From the place where I stand on this platform there are in- visible wires or lines of influence stretch- ing to every heart in all the seats on the main floor, and up into the boxes and gal- leries, and there are other innumerable wires or lines of influence reaching out from this place into the vast beyond, and across continents, and under the seas, for in my recent journey around the world I did not find a country where I had not been preaching this Gospel for many years through the printing press. So as a tele- graph operator sits or stands at a given point, and sends messages in all directions, and you only hear the click, click, click of the electric apparatus, but the telegrams, go on thetr errand, God help me now to touch the right key, and send the right message along the right wires to the right places! Who shall I first call up? To whom shall I send the message? I guess I will send the first to all the tired, wherever they are, for there are so many tired souls. Here goes the Christly message, "Come unto me all ye who are weary and I will give you rest." Who next shall I call up. I guess the next message will be to the fa- therless and widows, and here goes God's message, "Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive, and let thy wid- ows trust in me." Who next shall I call up? I guess my next message will be to those who have buried members of their own families, and here it goes, "The trum- pet shall sound and the dead shall rise." Who next shall I call up? I guess the next message will go to those who think them- selves too bad to be saved. Here it goes, "Let the wicked forsake his way and the unrighteous man his thoughts and let him return unto the Lord who will have mercy and unto our God who will abundantly pardon." Who next shall I call up? I guess it will be those who may think I have not yet touched their case. Here it goes, "Whosoever, whosoever, whosoever will, let him come." And now may God turn on all the electric power into this Gos- pel battery for the last tremendous mes- sage, so that it may thrill through this as- semblage, and through all the earth. Just six words will compose the message, and I touch the key of this Gospel battery just six times and the message has gone! Away! Away it flies! And the message is, "Have ye received the Holy Ghost?" That is, do you feel his power? Has he enabled you to sorrow over a wasted life, and take full pardon from the crucified Christ, and turned your face toward the wide open gates of a welcoming heaven? We appeal to thee, oh Holy Ghost, who didst turn the Philippian jailer, and Saul of Tarsus, and Lydia of Thyatira, and helped John Bunyan out of darkness when, as he describes it, "Down fell I as a bird shot from the top of the tree, into fearful despair, but was relieved by the comfort- able word, 'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin,'" and helped John Newton when standing at the helm of the ship in a midnight hurricane, and mightier than the waves that swept the decks came over him the memory of his blasphem- ous and licen- tious life, and he cried out, "My mother's God have mer- cy on me!" and helped one nearer home, even me, De Witt Talmage, at about eigh- teen years of age, that Sun- day night in the lovely village of Bl awenburgh, New Jersey, when I could not sleep be- cause the ques- tions of eternal destiny seized hold of me; and has helped me ever since to use as most ex- pressive of my own feeling:

A JAPANESE FESTIVAL CAR.

Amazing grace! how sweet the sound,
That saved a wretch like me!
I once was lost, but now am found,
Was blind, but now I see.

Through many dangers, toils and snares,
I have already come;
'Tis grace has brought me safe thus far,
And grace will lead me home.

LIGHT DAWNING IN JAPAN.

Our illustration on this page is from a photograph of an ornamented car, such as is occasionally seen at Japanese festivals. The grotesque carvings and decorations of the car, no less than the presence on it of fancifully dressed and masked figures, all indicate that what has now become a mere holiday show or spectacle, is in reality the survival of an old heathen rite or observ- ance probably relating to ancient custom of parading some heathen divinity for public worship. But Japan is gradually but sure- ly coming into the light and her idols are losing their influence. Contact with West- ern civilization and Christianity are doing wonders for the empire of the Rising Sun.

A Distinguished Preacher.

Death of Dr. R. W. Dale of Birmingham, England, a Lecturer of Yale College and an Eminent Preacher and Author.

A CABLE dispatch to New York on March 13th announced the death of a distinguished preacher, teacher and author who had many friends and admirers in this country. In 1878 the whole religious public was surprised to learn that the trus- tees of the Lyman Beecher lectureship at Yale had departed for the first time from their traditional policy in calling an Eng- lishman to fill the chair for the year. At the conclusion of the course there was not a voice of criticism of the innovation raised, but every one who had heard or read the series of lectures was heartily and profound- ly grateful for the benefits derived from the teaching that the Englishman had given. The lecturer was R. W. Dale, a name held in high honor throughout the country from that time forward.

Mr. Dale was one of the most prominent of English Congregationalists. He was a Londoner by birth, but all his life was giv- en to work in the Midland section of the country. At the age of twenty-three he was principal of a small country school. While occupying that position, he made the ac- quaintance of Rev. John Angell James, a famous Congregational minister and the author of the "Anxious Inquirer," a book which thirty or forty years ago had an enormous circulation in all English speak- ing lands and was translated into many for- eign languages. Mr. James took an inter- est in the young teacher and finding that he desired to enter the ministry, introduced him to Spring Hill College of which he was one of the managers. Mr. Dale speedily justified Mr. James' opinion of him. He became a fine scholar and his eloquence in the college debating room and on the plat- form raised the highest expectations of fu- ture power. The college was not empower- ed to grant degrees, but could send its stu- dents to the London University for exam- ination. Mr. Dale went there to compete for honors and won the degree of Master of Arts. Returning to Birmingham he be- came Mr. James' co-pastor at Carr's Lane Chapel, and when Mr. James died he suc- ceeded him. Many efforts have been made to attract him to larger pastorates in Lon- don but Mr. Dale remained faithful to his first charge and continued its pastor for a period of forty years.

Mr. Dale was as notable in the character of a Christian citizen as a minister. He took a deep interest in politics and in the affairs of social and business life. He had a firm belief in religion as the one means of purifying the city and keeping it pure. His sermons and the numerous books he pub- lished were all imbued with the one cardi- nal principle of adapting the religion of the New Testament to everyday life, and he probably did more than any other minister of his time to show how Christianity ought to influence the professional and business man. Of doctrine he had little to say; early in his career he cut loose from Cal- vinism and directed his chief efforts to the practical application of Christianity. He preached Christ as the end of controversy, the Saviour of men from the power of sin and all kinds of evil, and made that one subject the aim and end of all his preach- ing and writing. When he was chairman of the Congregational Union he exhorted his brethren in the ministry above all things to preach the living Christ.

THE TRIUMPHAL ENTRY.

S. S. Lesson for April 7. Mark 11:1-11. Golden Text Mark 11:9. By Mrs. Baxter.

THE ministry of the Lord Jesus was drawing to a close. But the supreme and closing act, his sacrificial death, which the disciples had not understood, and which only the already beheaded John the Baptist and the Mary who had sat at his feet had received, was fast approaching. Once again a multitude was thronging the Saviour; the healing of the man born blind, and the raising of Lazarus, while ripening the animosity of the political and ecclesiastical powers, had also tended to create anew the enthusiasm of the populace. The chief priests and Pharisees and, after the raising of Lazarus, they "gathered a council, and said: 'What do we? for this Man doeth many miracles. If we let him alone, all men will believe on him, and the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation.'" (John 11: 47, 48.) The people were quite ready to accept such a ruler as Jesus. The miracles he wrought were on their behalf, many amongst them had been healed by him, and they had heard of his feeding the multitute and stilling the sea of Galilee, miracles wrought on behalf of such as they were. On the other hand, the multitude, which would gladly have made Jesus King, wanted a king after their own order and not after God, and a kingdom of this world, while the kingdom of Christ was not of this world. In his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, the Lord Jesus showed to eyes that could see "the manner of the kingdom" as he would have it. Accompanied by the multitude which had witnessed the healing of Bartimeus, Jesus and his disciples approaching Jerusalem, drew near to the villages of Bethphage and Bethany, at the Mount of Olives. From thence "he sent forth two of his disciples and saith unto them, go your way into the village against you: and as soon as ye be entered into it, ye shall find a colt tied whereon never man sat; loose him and bring him. And if any man say unto you, why do ye this? say ye that the Lord hath need of him; and straight way he will send him hither." Was this all the preparation for the reception into his royal city of him who was by birth, and was shown to be by prophecy the King of the Jews? Was this the manner of the kingdom? To human eyes it looked as though such a preparation proved, beyond a doubt, that his claim to kingship must be false. Such a claim he himself had never made, and yet, when he was called the Son of David, and the King of Israel, he never, in a single instance denied his identity.

Trembled for their Influence,

Were these two disciples, sent out to seek a colt of an ass, sufficient heralds of the last advent of Jesus to Jerusalem in the days of his flesh? Yes; it was in just accord with the little, unknown company who at the time of his birth "looked for redemption in Jerusalem." (Luke 2: 33.) Before he could come in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory, he must come as "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." (John 1: 29), and fulfil the Jewish sacrifices, and the prophecies of a suffering Messiah. As at his birth the chief witness borne to him was from heaven when with the angel herald of his birth there was a multitude of the heavenly host praising God: so at his death in the earthquake and thick darkness, but far more in that "God raised him from the dead, the witness to our Lord was chiefly from heaven. And now the Saviour knew that a company of those who had come up to the feast of the Passover, would come out of the city to meet him (John 12: 12, 13), for the first time in his earthly career, he permitted external honor to be done to him. He did not seek it, but allowed it.

There was a quiet dignity, a true kingliness in his directions to his two disciples, and he provided for all emergencies, in case the owner of the colt should demand an explanation: "The Lord hath need of him," was to be their only answer, and it should be enough. No force was to be used; no expense was to be incurred, externals were not needed to impose an appreciative awe upon the multitude. Jesus himself, who had healed them of their sicknesses, who had taught, and comforted, and helped, and above all had forgiven sins, needed no accessories to inspire his followers with a sense of his importance. He had no band of soldiers, no martial or other music, no carefully woven garlands of flowers to grace his entry into the royal city.

His Presence was Enough.

The multitude which accompanied him, and the multitude which came out to meet him, met, but neither had made any previous preparations. All the honor done to him was the spontaneous outflow of grateful hearts. Some had cast their loose garment on the little ass's colt which was honored to bear Jesus. Some cast their outer garment in the way to be a carpet on which he should ride. Others hastily cut down branches from the trees, or perhaps more correctly, leaves, and strewed them in the way; and the strange, unorganized procession which preceded and followed him cried, "Hosanna, (1.2. Save now) Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord: blessed be the kingdom of our Father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord." It was a song of praise drawn from several Scriptures, and undoubtedly the multitudes imagined that here and now the Christ was about to fulfil these prophecies and enter upon his temporal reign. How little they understood what must take place first! How little prepared were they for events, which in a few days, would draw from perhaps some of the very lips which cried "Hosanna!" the echo of the chief priest's cry, "Crucify him! Crucify him!"

In this short hour of triumph, priests and rules were conspicuously absent, and he who, when he comes again in glory shall appear as "the King of kings, and the Lord of lords," was satisfied with the homage of the poor in his one short, and apparently mean, triumph on earth! Jerusalem must know, however, that the Son of David was in her midst. "When he was come into Jerusalem all the city was moved, saying, Who is this?" (Matt. 21: 10.) Is it possible that he who had raised Lazarus from the dead, and healed the man born blind, who had taught so frequently in the temple, and who had done so many miracles, was an unknown person in Jerusalem? Was the indifference of the chosen city come to such a degree as this? Was it to such an extent that she knew not "the day of her visitation?" (Luke 19: 44.) The multitude knew, and answered those who inquired: "This is Jesus the prophet of Nazareth of Galilee." They withheld testimony which they had borne to him outside the city. But Jesus had truer witnesses in the children which had caught up the cry of the throng, when first they met Jesus, and who continued to repeat: "Hosanna to the Son of David!

What was about to happen? Now that Jesus had begun to permit them to know him, would he not at last assert himself? Such may have been the thought of many in that multitude. But nothing happened as they expected. His triumph was short. A few more teachings in the temple, a few more lessons to his disciples, some nights spent in prayer, and then the Cross, with the title over it: "This is the King of Jews."

To follow Christ fully, to follow all along the way, means to be "despised and rejected as he was, to be, before the eyes of men, and in our own eyes, a failure as he was; to experience "the world knoweth us not because it knew him not." (1. John 3: 1.) Our portion here is not greater than his portion. The world may ride on its horses; we may have to be content with an ass's colt. The world has the great and the noble to grace its triumphs, we have to be content to be followed as he was by poor disciples and children. The great are too great to understand and to appreciate him, and they will think nothing of us unless we do well unto ourselves. (Ps. 49 18.) Can we afford to follow him at this cost? To a heart really won over to his side it is no cost at all, but truest glory. So let us, like Paul, suffer the loss of all things and count them but dung that we may know him, and the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made comformable to his death, if that by any means we attain unto the resurrection of the dead.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE pathos of the triumphal entry of Christ into Jerusalem becomes more apparent as his life is studied. He who had thwarted the people when they wanted to make him a king, let them do as they would on this one occasion, when his death was near. It was as if, for once before he died he would taste the sweets of worldly honor and applause. The journey appears to have been made on the last Sunday of his life. The narratives of the four Evangelists need putting together to obtain a definite idea of the actual events. John, as usual, supplements the other three, with facts omitted by them, or placed out of chronological order. From him alone, we learn that Jesus made a stay at Bethany on his way from Jericho to Jerusalem. The feast, too, at which Mary poured the costly ointment on Christ's head and feet, we learn from John, preceded his going to Jerusalem and probably took place on that Saturday night. We may infer that he passed the day, which was the Jewish Sabbath, in the comparative quiet of Bethany, the little village on the slope of the Mount of Olives, two miles away from the great city, which at that season would be crowded with the descendants of Abraham, come from all parts of the country and from foreign lands, to celebrate the Passover. His presence at Bethany was, however, known in Jerusalem, news of it being doubtless carried there by the caravan with which he had traveled from the Samaritan frontier, through Jericho, as far as Bethany. His friends went out to greet him and with them went a crowd eager to see him, who was reported to have brought a dead man to life and to see Lazarus too, who was also at Bethany. The feast was made by Simon the Leper, a man of whom we have heard nothing before this, but probably one whom Jesus had miraculously cured at some former time, and who was now giving practical expression to his gratitude. The scene is very vivid as the Evangelists describe it. Jesus the guest of honor, Lazarus with him at the table, the disciples grouped around, Martha as usual busy serving and Mary coming in with her treasured perfume the odor of which fills the house. All happy, rejoicing and approving, save Judas, who alone thinks the treasure wasted when it is given to Jesus. So the evening passes and the next day Jesus resumes his journey to Jerusalem, the consequences of which were clear to his mind. He will go as a king and yet not as a mighty conqueror, but as he wishes to be received, as the gentle Prince of Peace. The disciples are sent for a steed, that he may go as befits his illustrious state and as the prophet Zechariah had foretold. They are directed to bring the colt of an ass, on which no man had yet ridden, and mounted on this animal, on which some enthusiastic friend had flung his burnouse to serve as a saddle, he descends the hill into the valley and up the opposite hill to the royal city. The people in Jerusalem hear that he is coming and go out to meet him and join with the procession following him, chanting as they go the psalm, "Blessed is he that cometh—that cometh in the name of the Lord." So with songs and waving palms he enters the city of David.

"BLESSED BE THE KING THAT COMETH."

And they brought the colt to Jesus. The ass of the Holy Land was a different creature from the same animal among us. With us it is a symbol of stupidity and obstinacy while in the East it is remarkable for its intelligence, patience and gentleness. The color is usually a reddish-brown but there are white asses which are much prized. The most noble and honorable among the Jews were wont to ride on asses. It was a symbol of dignity and peace. Christ doubtless meant by the selection of this animal as his steed to indicate the peaceful character of his rule. His entry into the capital of his kingdom was thus in marked contrast to the triumphal entries which history records. One of the most conspicuous of these was the entry into Rome of Cæsar after his conquest of Gaul, which occurred seventy-six years before this entrance of Christ into Jerusalem. Four consecutive days the procession of the conqueror was passing through the gates. Behind Cæsar's triumphal car came his illustrious captives. Vercingetorix, prince of the Arverni was there; Arsinoe, the sister of Cleopatra of Egypt and the son of Juba, king of Mauretania. Troops of royal and princely prisoners from Gaul, Egypt, Pontus and Africa, with trophies and treasure swelled the mighty procession and represented to the people of Rome the achievements of Cæsar. Those were the fruits of bloody victories; but this King whose empire like the stone which the prophet saw cut without hands that filled the whole earth, was content to ride on an ass with no captives but his willing, loving followers, and no acclamations but of those of children crying Hosanna.

They that went before cried Hosanna. The word means, "Save now" and as the people used it on this occasion, meant, "Lord, save this son of David." There was evidently a great deal of enthusiasm, but not many days afterward, all this enthusiasm seems to have disappeared. The only cries on record on the Friday morning, following this Sunday were, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" Perhaps they were not raised by the same people who cried Hosanna, but these people seem to have been silent in his trouble. There is not much ground for confidence in popular enthusiasm. The people huzzahed and "vived" when Napoleon returned from his exile in Elba. Even the soldiers deserted their officers to follow him. His secretary said such touching evidence of affection must be very gratifying to Napoleon. "Pshaw," said the Emperor, "it is worth nothing. This same crowd would be just as excited and delighted if I were going to the scaffold."

Blessed is he that cometh. In the first quarter of the sixteenth century, Tunis, the seaport on the north coast of Africa, was a den of horrors. The powerful Barbarossa with a fleet of swift vessels prowled about the Mediterranean capturing vessels like a great pirate. The cargoes were sold in various markets, but the crews and passengers were taken to Tunis as slaves. A large proportion were white people of Christian nationality. Some were sold to traders and others were kept at Tunis in enforced labor and under appalling barbarities. They had no hope of deliverance for who had a fleet capable of coping with the powerful Barbarossa? But in 1535, news was whispered in Tunis that caused every slave's heart to beat quicker and his pulses to quicken. The great Emperor Charles V., Emperor of Germany, King of Spain and the Netherlands, and Archduke of Austria had declared war on Barbarossa. Not many months afterward Charles was master of the city. As he passed through the gates with his armed men ten, thousand men, women and children knelt in the street and hailed him as their deliverer. Within a month the were scattered all over Europe on their way to their homes, declaring everywhere the praises of the mighty Charles.

HIS FOURTH YEAR RICHLY BLESSED.

Our Sunday School Missionary's Marvelous Record of Work Accomplished During a Twelve-Month—A Large Number of New Sunday Schools and Churches Founded During 1894 and Many Souls Won for Christ—Another Year Begun.

OUR years have passed away since THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the prayerful and practical cooperation of many of its readers, undertook the support of a Sunday School missionary in the outlying and neglected sections of the Southwest. Rev. George W. Sharp, who was chosen for this important work, has during that time labored most earnestly and successfully, and

th results of his efforts during the first three years are wellknown to most readers of his journal. The fourth and by far the most important and fruitful year of his missionary labor has just closed, and his report, printed below, is one that may well afford sincere pleasure to the hearts of all who have assisted in keeping this consecrated worker in the field. He writes:

ften among strangers, and more than usual from home, I have been blessed with health most of the time, and in all the exposure connected with laboring in needy districts I have been preserved through storm and drought.

Nearly a Thousand Visitations.

he whole number of visits made to families was 940. In these visits I often explained the Way of Life, distributed a great amount of Gospel literature of an unsectarian character, prayed with the people, and furnished copies of the Scriptures to persons in homes that had none. In my addresses I sought to enlist the aged and the young in the study of the Bible in Sunday Schools and in their homes. In sermons and addresses parental obligation and blessing in training children for God was preached, the young warned against the perils and immoralities of youth, and old and young were especially taught the necessity of being born of God through faith in Christ.

o pen can adequately portray the opportunities occurring in a year's work for the spread of the Gospel, nor the great need one finds in missionary tours among the neglected districts for Sunday Schools and preaching of the Word. I would be glad if I had found it convenient to keep a record of the many who, in private, and in school houses, and church in the years of my missionary labors, have promised to meet me in heaven.

Many New Schools and Churches.

Last year I aided ten protracted meetings and saw much of God's goodness in comforting saints and saving sinners; organized thirty-two new schools, having 135 teachers and 1245 scholars; addressed and otherwise aided twenty-seven others, having 163 teachers, and 1757 scholars; visits and aids to schools previously reported, twenty-five, having 140 teachers and 1573 scholars. Total number of schools labored with during the year, eighty-four, having 438 teachers, and 4, 575 scholars; sermons and addresses, 186; miles traveled, 7,891.

The following is a summary of the visible results of missionary labor for the sixteen years and one month in which I have been engaged in the work up to March 1, 1895. It is scarcely possible to give an exact statement of all the points, but the following is a carefully prepared estimate, mainly from my records:

A Marvelous Record of Christian Work.

Whole number of schools organized, addressed or otherwise aided, 651; having 35,512 teachers and scholars; visits to families, 6,240; sermons and addresses, 3,325; conducted or aided 75 revival meetings, usually continuing from one to five weeks, in which I have witnessed hundreds of conversions; number of S. S. Institutes, Conventions, &c. (township, county, district, State, and national), about 70; Bibles and Testaments distributed, 2,810; and, I suppose, cart-loads of Gospel books, tracts, papers, &c., in addition to numberless copies of periodical Sunday School literature, probably amounting to several hundred thousand; miles traveled 74,998, nearly three times the distance around the globe; in spring, summer, and early autumn, mostly by private conveyance: in cold weather mostly by rail.

Many churches have been organized by Protesant denominations where I have organized Sunday Schools, and many church houses have been erected where the schools were started in school houses, a store room, and cheap halls. Some of the converts where I have labored have become useful ministers of the Gospel and soul-winners. Some of these ministers are now occupying pulpits in very important positions; two young lady Superintendents have become foreign missionaries.

Relief Work in Minnesota and Kansas.

My relief work among the forest fire sufferers of Minnesota in September, has already been published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which furnished the funds. I embraced the opportunity at the memorial service while there, of preaching the Gospel to the largest number of bereaved people I ever saw in one congregation. That fire was the most appalling calamity of its kind in the history of America.

I have but recently returned from Nebraska and Kansas, where I distributed five immense car-loads of clothing, bedding, provisions, &c., and more than a thousand dollars in money, all raised by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for Western drought sufferers. I also located and gave directions for its distribution in a drought-stricken portion of Kansas, a splendid car-load of provisions, etc., donated by the people of Armstrong, Mo., and vicinity. The contents of these six cars having been turned over to reliable relief committees, each car furnishes a depot of supplies for a large district of distribution. I have not yet received reports from all the six cars, as they have not been entirely distributed by the committees, the food particularly being given out from time to time as needed. We may reasonably hope the six cars, and the aid procured by the money expended, will bring a measure of relief to between twenty thousand and twenty-five thousand persons.

What has God wrought? All the success that has attended the work has been in answer to believing, persevering prayer. Not only do I pray daily, and usually often each day, for God's blessing on this work, but many Christians do likewise. I appreciate the help of praying friends, and earnestly ask its continuance for myself, my family and my work.

THE BOWERY MISSION.

salvation, and the multitude of converts that go out to scatter the Gospel abroad is being constantly augmented. These converts are of almost every faith and nationality: Jew, Gentile, Mohammedan, Catholic, and Protestant. Many are now, in distant parts of the world, testifying to the reality of their conversion by their changed lives and their loving and efficient work for the Master. Drunkards, wanderers, criminals and helpless men who had lost their moorings and were being swept onward to perdition, found in the Bowery Mission a blessed haven of peace and the entrance to a new and better life.

Among a multitude of notable cases were these typical ones:

An educated pharmacist, an infidel, on the eve of committing suicide, entered the Mission, heard the Word from the text, "What shall I do to be saved?" became converted, accepted the Saviour and is now a redeemed man.

A young man, reared under Christian influences in the West, went to Chicago, secured employment with a leading dry-goods firm, soon entered a life of dissipation, became a defaulter, and for some years followed a sinful and dissipated life, indulging in gambling, drinking and kindred vices. Finally, homeless and friendless, he entered the Mission, was converted and redeemed, is now steadily employed, and living an upright Christian life.

A poor homeless drunkard, while wandering upon the Bowery, heard the singing within the Mission, entered, was redeemed, and is now restored to his family. He has found steady employment. He induced his wife to come to the Mission, and she, too, now rejoices in the salvation which is in Christ Jesus. The result is a happy Christian home.

A man from Philadelphia, formerly a postal clerk, but who, through participation in some electi n frauds, had been sent to prison and gradually drifted from bad to worse, found himself in New York City a fugitive from justice. He entered the Mission, heard of the power of God to save, through Christ Jesus, accepted, and has since been restored to family, home and friends.

Two men, one having spent eighteen years of his life behind prison bars, and the other having been in prison six times, found their way to the Bowery Mission, heard of the Saviour and are now redeemed men. Both are now employed and testify nightly to the glory of God, declaring what has been done for them. These are only a few among many hundreds that might be mentioned did space permit.

Some three years ago, the Mission was transferred to the large and commodious building, No. 105 Bowery, which it now occupies. It has a spacious and very attractive chapel, with an extension for Bible Class and Inquiry Room; also a Reading Room, baths and four dormitory flours. The latter are clean and comfortable, and the sanitary condition of the entire mission is admirable. For the sleeping rooms a nominal charge is made and the revenue from this source, added to the liberal donations of friends, have furnished the support of the work. The religious exercises include a preaching service every Sabbath afternoon and a popular Gospel service every evening, usually closing with an inquiry meeting. Large numbers attend, the usual daily average being three hundred, and many of these become inquirers after the way of life. As the attendance is constantly changing, the number who are spiritually impressed after a few days' stay at the Mission is large and steadily increasing.

Most of the men who come to the Bowery Mission have truly been "feeding on the husks," and have come to the turning-point in their lives. They have reached the very bottom and can go no further into the depths of human misery. Then what follows is in the nature of progress upward. Hardly an evening passes in which from fifteen to twenty-five persons do not profess conversion. During the last five months, over one hundred of these converts could be named who have given such evidence of the new life as are unmistakable. Every profession and almost every known business is represented among those who attend. There is a large proportion among them who, having come thither from other towns, have been ensnared by the pitfalls of the Bowery and have at last reached the Mission in a pitiful plight—sometimes absolutely penniless and even almost naked. Many of them are assisted by the Mission which acts the part of the good Samaritan; and after a time they go home full of gratitude and firm in their determination to hold fast to the new life that has been opened to them since entering its hospitable doors. So many remarkable transformations of sinful natures have occurred there, that one cannot help being convinced that the thing which even Solomon declared was impossible, has been accomplished by the power from above, for the Bowery Mission has never encountered a case that was absolutely hopeless.

A Special Service of Prayer is now held every Sunday afternoon at the Mission Hall, at which requests for prayer from earnest seekers in many different parts of the Union are read and laid before the Lord in supplication. This service is unique in the fact that it is attended by converts exclusively. Last Sunday afternoon over forty men—all sincere Christians—were present and a large proportion shared in the petitions. Among the special communications presented, asking for prayer, were these:

From Mrs. P. G., Troy, N. Y., for the conversion of two sons and a daughter.

From An Anxious Wife and Mother for the conversion of her husband and son, the latter of whom is surrounded with fierce temptations in the West.

From S. Jordan, Ky., for the restoration of sight.

From A Kansas Mother for the conversion of an erring daughter and an unbelieving son.

From ——, Spring Garden, Pa., for the conversion of the son of a deceased Presbyterian minister who has imbibed infidel notions.

From A Lonely Girl, Hoboken, N. J., whose parents are dead, and who is being continually entreated by the only person who is interested in her to do wrong, and who is in fear of falling, that God will give her strength to keep to the right.

From An Anxious Husband, Saratoga, N. Y., that grace may be given him to forgive a wife who confesses that she has given him cause for divorce, but is pleading with him for forgiveness.

From A Believer in Prayer, for the recovery from sickness of a beloved one who is critically ill.

From A Subscriber, that God would preserve an only son who has formed friendship with men who frequent saloons.

From E. F. A. for the conversion of her father, son and daughter, and that she may have grace to live as a Christian ought to live.

From A Mother for the conversion of her only son who has been an infidel.

From A Widow, New York, that she may be forgiven for a grievous sin into which she was betrayed by misplaced confidence.

From Mrs. George T——, for the restoration of a husband who is a backslider from God.

From E. T. L., N. Y., for a work of grace in a church, the members of which have imbibed loose doctrines and are not pure in their associations with each other.

From A Mother in Ohio. That her boy who came to New York seven months ago, and has never written home may be mercifully preserved and led to Jesus.

All letters received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD containing requests for prayers will be laid before the Converts' Prayer Meeting every Sunday afternoon hereafter.

Those among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who desire to be enrolled on the list of Patrons of the Bowery Mission, and who feel disposed to aid the work once a year with a contribution towards defraying the incidental expenses, are requested to send their names and addresses. All such letters will be answered by Dr. Klopsch personally, who desires to be put in direct communication with every one who wishes to share with himself the burden and the blessing of this far-reaching Christian work. It is a labor of love, undertaken with no other purpose than that this Mission's glorious work during the last fourteen years may be perpetuated and that the Gospel of Jesus may still have a powerful and popular exponent in the centre of the great East side, and on the darkest and most sinful thoroughfare in our native land.

A CALL TO SERVICE.

AN opportunity for doing a work of far-reaching and permanent good has occurred, which appears to the proprietor of this journal a distinct and clear call to service. During the past five years the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have made him their almoner in several emergencies. All these repeated noble philanthropies speak the same language. They tell the world that He who had compassion on the multitude because they had nothing to eat, still lives, and that through his people he still feeds the hungry, clothes the naked, and breaks the bread of life to those who long for salvation.

The confidence reposed in him by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is very gratifying to the proprietor, and he has taken pains to faithfully discharge the trust in every instance. But it also entails responsibility. He has asked himself how those who have trusted him would wish him to act in a new emergency. What this emergency is, is fully described on the first page of this number. After careful and prayerful consideration he has been led to the conclusion that the call to service is imperative. He is sure that the readers of the paper would, if they knew all the facts, commission him to proceed. In that confidence he has undertaken the work as their representative, and proposes to give to it his best thought and energy. What the Bowery Mission may become in the hands of such people as the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is known only to God. It is for Him to lead, to guide, and direct, and it is for Him to bless. That it will be a great work there can be no doubt. God always blesses what is undertaken with a pure heart in his service.

The difficulties of the work, its cost, the hindrances to be encountered and overcome have all been considered, and there is no disposition to under-estimate them. But there need be no doubt or uncertainty as to the ultimate issue, if two conditions are fulfilled. The first necessity is that every reader shall pray at least once a day that God will bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bowery Mission. The second is, that every reader who wishes to be identified with the effort will send his name and address to be enrolled in the list of those who have part and lot in this attempt to rescue the lost and bring souls into the Kingdom.

PROBABLY.

WE were set to rapid thinking when we read in a paper concerning the work of a distinguished Evangelist, the paragraph saying: "Probably the Lord is blessing his work." We [illegible] a more pitiable predicament than that word "Probably." Oh, how hard it is to acknowledge that men are doing good if they do not work in our way and by our methods! One's heart must have got awfully twisted who can look on a great outpouring of the Holy Ghost and have any use for probabilities. The tendency is even among Christians to depreciate that which goes on independent of themselves, and in a way oppugnant to their personal taste. People do not like those who do a thing which they themselves have not been able to accomplish. The first cry is, "The people converted are the lower population and not the educated." We wonder if five hundred souls brought to Christ from the "Cowgate" and "Coalhole," and made kings and priests unto God, and at last seated on thrones so high they will not be able to reach down with their foot to the crown of an earthly monarch, is not worth some consideration. Then the cry is, "They will not hold out." Time only will show that. They are doing all they can. You cannot expect them to hold out ten years in six weeks. The most faithful Christians we have ever known were brought in through revivals, and the meanest, stingiest, dullest, hardest-to-get-on-with Christians have joined when the church was dead. When a candidate for admission comes before Session in revival times, we ask him only seven or eight questions, but when he comes during a cold state of religion we ask him twenty questions and get the elders to ask him as many more. In other words, we have more faith in conversions under special religious influence than under ordinary. The best luck we ever had in fishing was when we dropped the net in the bay and brought up at one haul twenty blue fish with only three or four moss-bunkers, and the poorest luck we ever had was when after standing two hours in the soggy meadow, with one hook on the line, we felt we had a bite, and began to pull, more and more persuaded of the great size of our captive, until we flung to the shore a snapping-turtle. As a Gospel fisherman we would rather run the risk of a large haul than of a solitary angling. We can soon sort out and throw overboard the few moss-bunkers. Oh, for great awakenings all over Christendom! We have had a drought so long, we can stand a freshet. Let the Hudson and the Thames and the Susquehanna rise and overflow the low lands, and the earth be full of the knowledge of God as the waters fill the seas. That time is hastening probably!

A CONTINENTAL REPUBLIC.

GEOGRAPHERS say there are five continents and two of them make up this Western hemisphere. Now it is one continent from Arctic to Antarctic. It is a little narrower around the waist, but no one has the idea that because we are narrow around the waist that therefore we have two bodies. North America and South America are one continent just as much as your shoulder and your foot are part of the same body. You may depend upon it, this continent, and from pole to pole, is to be reserved for the experiment of free goverment to be wrought out successfully. Everything in the eastern hemisphere tends toward monarchy; everything in the western hemisphere to free government. Witness Brazil, not long ago, gently but determinedly putting down its throne. Witness all the South American republics. From Baffin's Bay to Terra del Fuego it will all yet be given up to republican form of government, and I think that before the next century is as far gone by as is the present century, from the top of what is now called North America to the foot of what is now called South America, will be under one government. By that time the telegraph and the telephone and the limited express and aerial navigation will have been so far developed that the distances will be abolished. But, whether it be one republic or many republics, this continent is separated by so many thousands of miles on one side from the monarchies of Europe and by so many thousands of miles on the other side from the superstitions of Asia that it will be able unhindered to demonstrate what free government can do for the human race.

But remember that the worst form of government on earth is a republican form of government unless the people are intelligent and moral. Better an unlimited monarchy, and no chance for the people to rule if they are ignorant and vicious. Without the schoolhouse and the church, free government is a dead failure. Therefore urge on all educational and evangelizing influences if you would have the form of government under which we live benign and perpetual. This whole American continent will yet be gospelized, and a new crusade of righteousness be organized for a redeemed hemisphere. Under the baton of these orchestras, made up from all nations may there start a doxology that shall roll round the world.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

If any of our readers who know of active, zealous Christian workers in their neighborhood who, without fee or reward, are devoting time and means to the service of Christ in rescuing the lost, uplifting the fallen or befriending the sick and poor, would send us biographical sketches of such persons—men or women—we should be glad. The story of their work, showing their methods and the success which has attended them, might encourage other Christian people to undertake similar work in their cities. The sketch should be accompanied in every instance by a photograph of the person. Address all letters to Editor of Christian Workers' Department, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

Mrs. D. S. Farnsworth, Emporia, Neb. What and where is Utopia?

Utopia is a poetic fiction—an imaginary country, having a perfect social and political system; any ideal, perfect place is so designated. It was the leading idea in a famous romance by Sir Thomas More, published in 1516, and which has formed the basis of many stories and romances written in later years, dealing with ideal conditions of society.

Ida Williams, Adel, Iowa. Is it possible to ascertain the age of Isaac when his father was commanded to offer him as a sacrifice?

Not from the Bible. He is spoken of there as a lad, but as such an epithet probably bore a relation to the length of life at that period there is nothing inconsistent with it in accepting the statement of Josephus that he was twenty-five years old.

Student, East Marion, L. I. What is the true ideal of forgiveness? Must an offender be treated as if he had never committed the offence?

Christ gives the rule and he reiterated it in various forms. We were to forgive as, or in the same way as, we wish God to forgive us. The parable of the unmerciful servant (Matt. 18 23-35) puts the rule in a vivid form and it closes with a most emphatic warning.

Miserable Sinner, Pekasie, Pa. There is nothing in the circumstances you describe to prevent you from claiming forgiveness through Christ. If you truly repent and go to him pleading his promises and asking his help to forsake your sin you will assuredly be forgiven and restored to his love. But remember, he will know if you are sincere and will not be satisfied with anything short of real repentance.

A. L. P. Knightville, Me. 1. Will a person who regards the Bible and aims to do right, although not a Christian, enter the Kingdom of Heaven? 2. Is it any worse to play cards than to play checkers or chess? 3. Where in the Bible is there any command to keep the first day of the week holy instead of the seventh day?

1. Christ himself answers the question in his talk with Nicodemus. (See John 3:5). We cannot conceive of any person who rejects God's own Son, after hearing that he came to save him, being admitted to the kingdom of heaven. He deliberately affronts God. 2. Intrinsically there may be no more harm in the one game than in the other, but the associations are different. Cards are associated with gambling and those who wish to obey the apostolic injunction to avoid the appearance of evil will not use them. 3. There is no explicit command to observe the one day instead of the other. Nor are there explicit commands for many other changes in Christian observance. The old dispensation with its worn out ceremonies and observances has passed away and we celebrate the day on which the new one was triumphantly inaugurated by the resurrection of our Lord.

J. M. L., Porter, Ogden, Mich. Was the omission of Matt. 18: 11 from the Revised Version accidental or intentional, and if the latter, for what reason?

The marginal note at that place shows that the omission was intentional. The revisers had before them copies of the Gospel of more ancient date than those that were available in 1611 when the Authorized Version was issue and it must be concluded that those copies not contain the verse. The verse is, howev found in Luke 19: 10, and there the revis retain it.

Subscriber, Grand Rapids, Mich. Is a preac right in concluding a prayer with the wo "Save us for Jesus' sake?" If he is a conver man is he not saved already?

The preacher in offering public prayer rep sents his congregation whose needs he voic In that sense he may use petitions not spec ly applicable to himself. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

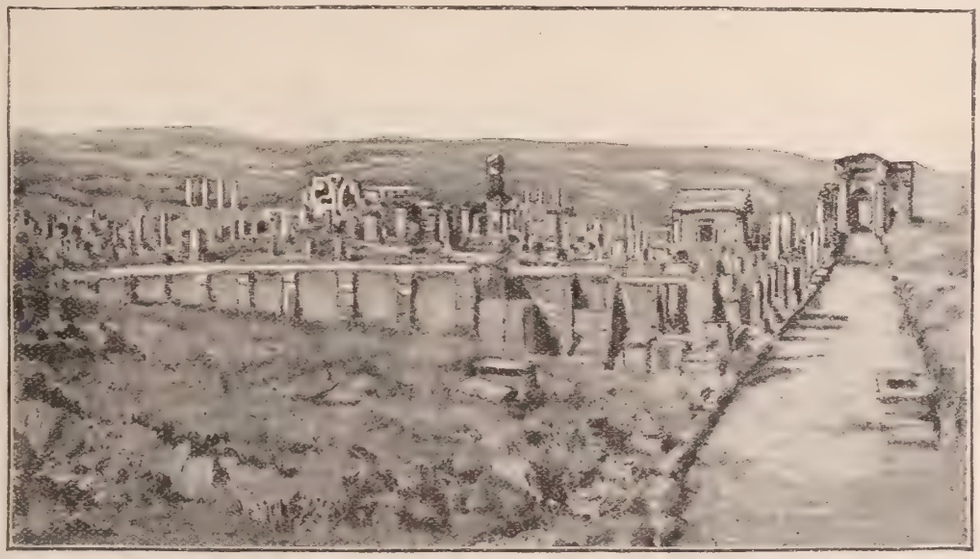
DISCOVERY OF A ROMAN CITY.

NEWS of a discovery of intense interest to antiquaries comes from Northern Africa. Far away among the spurs of the Atlas mountains, apart from the tracks of the tourist, and fifty miles from the nearest rab settlement, the ruins of the ancient Roman city of Thamutuda have been found and identified. It was a place of considerable importance in the time of the Cæsars, being in the centre of the African provinces, a depot for the collection and storage of grain, and a military station where a strong force was maintained to keep the mountain tribes in order. The ruins show how imposing a city it must have been in its day. They cover an area of about two miles in length and three-quarters of a mile wide. The principal street was a fine, broad thoroughfare lined on each side by a row of magnificent columns and terminated in a triumphal arch, which even in its ruin is singularly beautiful. The Forum was an imposing pile. Its pavement is still intact and there is a long colonnade looking over the fertile plains and giving a view of the hills. The tribune still stands supported by columns bearing inscriptions which are even now legible. On the slope of the hill stood the theatre and northward was an imposing temple, supposed to have been dedicated to Jupiter. Many houses still bear the inscriptions cut upon them near two thousand years ago and there are statues and earthenware vessels scattered among the ruins from which it is possible to learn how the inhabitants of the city lived in those times. It should the fate of the Roman Empire and in the devastation of A. D. 429 it was deserted. Some efforts were made to rebuild it in the sixth century, but the Arab invasion scattered the people and Rome being no longer able to defend it, the city fell into ruins and was forgotten by all except the historians and antiquaries. The ruins now simply tell the story of a magnificence and splendor which has passed away never to return. The sight of the grand ruins suggests the question whether our modern cities will decay and fall as these ancient cities have done. The answer depends on the conduct of the people. The God still rules who has said, "I will cause the arrogance of the proud to cease and will lay low the haughtiness of the terrible." (Isa. 13: 11.)



THE NEWLY DISCOVERED RUINS OF A ROMAN CITY IN ALGERIA.

An Escape from Church.

A press dispatch from Fort Deposit, Md., reports the dispersion of a congregation in an unusual and somewhat undignified manner that that place on March 3. There had been an ice-gorge in the Susquehanna River just above the town which had held back some time. It broke about noon and a new gorge formed below the town. The result was a sudden and dangerous flood. One account says that in less than half an hour the waters rose more than four feet. The news was carried to the various churches and the services were shortened to allow the congregations to get to their homes before the streets were flooded. The buildings along the water-front were already surrounded by water to the depth of two or three feet and the people were removing their valuables through the upper floor windows to take them to higher ground. The congregation at the Presbyterian church found their escape cut off by the doors in front of the building as the water was flowing deep and strong through the street. They might have been imprisoned for some hours in the church had it not been found that the road at the back was still dry. A convenient window gave access to this road and the people clambered through it in safety. Their conduct illustrates the difference between the church-building and the church. In the storms of life and in the flood of death he alone is safe who is in the church of Christ. As the Psalmist said, In the floods of great waters they shall not come nigh him. (Psalm 32: 6).

Died by Agreement.

A strange document was handed to the police in New York last week in connection with a suicide. A man shot himself in a hotel, and when he was found there was an envelope beside his body stating that the family with whom he boarded would attend to the obsequies. The address was given and the police sent to the place. They were shown a type-written agreement whereby the deceased had contracted to leave the family all his belongings, including the proceeds of a life insurance policy, if they would keep him for four months, paying for medical attendance and giving him five dollars a week for spending money. The document also stipulated that if he died before the end of the four months, they should also pay the cost of having his body cremated. They said that the man told them he had worked hard all his life, and he wanted to see some pleasure before he died. He believed he had an incurable disease which would end his life in four months, and, in any case, he knew he would die within that time, and he had set his heart on having his body cremated. The time had not quite expired when he shot himself. He seems to have been concerned more about the disposition of his body than about the destination of his soul. To the ordinary mind, with a true conception of the relative importance of the two, his conduct seems the height of foolishness. Yet how many there are who act on the same principle! In the effort to secure ease and comfort for their last years they shorten their lives and lose their souls. (Isa. 22: 13.)

Out of the Sea.

A package of letters and postal cards came by the Cunard steamer "Aurania" to New York on March 9, which had been at the bottom of the sea. The letters were all from Christiania, Norway, and bore the postal mark of that city, with the date January 26. They were addressed to various persons in the United States, and each bore the statement that it had been found floating in the sea. The date of mailing indicates that they had been part of the mails which were being brought to America by the "Elbe" when she was sunk by the collision. The contents were legible, though the paper showed that it had been water-soaked. Probably many of them contained messages of affection from friends across the sea to loved ones who have come to live on this side. There may have been persons on the ill-fated steamer bringing similar messages, which will never be delivered. The voices of those who bore them are hushed by the catastrophe in the silence of death. But the letters survived the wreck and reached the persons for whom they were intended. We are not always right in our ideas of what is permanent and what is perishable. In the final catastrophe of universal wreck, the world will be surprised at the things that will survive. Christ said, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall never pass away." (Matt. 24: 35.)

The Cost of a Cipher.

The judges of the Court of Common Pleas in New York had a case before them on March 7 which has been held over for consideration and a new attempt at a friendly settlement. The plaintiff is a maker of lampions for decorative illumination. In 1892 he was invited to send samples of his manufacture to the Committee on Art Decorations in connection with the Columbian celebration. The samples were satisfactory, and one was selected and the price arranged. The manufacturer received a written order, which, as he read it, called for four hundred thousand lampions. He was surprised at the number, but as the larger it was the more profit he would make, he was gratified, too. He increased his facilities and his staff of employees and had the order filled by the time appointed. But to his dismay he learned that the committee required only forty thousand of the lampions, and believed that the order called for only that number. After fruitless attempts to effect a settlement, the court is asked to decide whether a character in the order is a cipher, as the plaintiff contends, or a period, as the committee contends. If the character is a cipher, the order was 400,000; if it is a period, it is for 40,000. The difference in money is twelve thousand dollars. So much is involved in the ambiguity about a character which is the symbol for nothing. If we could only read now the consequences of our light words, as we shall read them in the light of eternity, we should find that still more serious issues are involved in expressions by which we mean nothing. Christ said that for every idle word that men speak they will have to give account in the day of judgment. (Matt. 12: 36.)

A Warning Mistaken.

A family had a narrow escape from being burned to death in Williamsburgh, N. Y., last week through an unjust suspicion. A man and his wife with their two children occupied the fourth floor of a flat-house which caught fire in the early morning hours. The third floor was untenanted at the time, and the people on the fourth, which was the top floor, seem to have been forgotten when the fire was discovered. It was in the basement, and the tenants of the first and second floors were too busy getting out their belongings to think of them. But some one remembered, and then the question arose how they could be aroused. The staircase was on fire, and there were no ladders long enough to reach the windows from the outside. The warning was given at last by a man who lived in an adjoining house. It was not so high as the one that was burning, but he could reach a window in the floor below that occupied by the imperiled family. He thrust a pole through the plate-glass, and the crash awoke them. The man jumped out of bed, and, bidding his wife keep quiet, he armed himself, barricaded the doors and prepared to do battle with the robbers that he thought must have broken into the house. The shouts of "fire" that he heard he mistook for a ruse of the thieves to induce him to open the door. It was not until much precious time was lost that he realized his danger. A rope was flung to him, with which he lowered his children to the roof of the adjoining house, and then he and his wife also descended, but as the man crept through the window the room was already in flames, and in another minute the floor fell in. It was a narrow escape, and the man must be very thankful that he found out his mistake before it was too late. How many there are whom clergymen and Christian workers are trying to convince of their danger, who are under a similar delusion! People treat the warning now as the men of ancient Sodom treated the warning of Lot, who "seemed as one that mocked unto his sons-in-law." (Gen. 19: 14.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Evangelist Arthur Crane, of Plainfield, N. J., has just closed a successful series of meetings at Washington, Ohio. He has accepted invitations to labor in several towns in central New York.

Rev. A. B. Simpson Announces That a Party of missionaries will be ready to start to China in a few days, and a party for the Congo will leave early next month. The latter have been studying the language in his college during the winter, and will be ready for work at a much shorter interval after landing than is usually the case.

A Jewish Paper Complains that owing to the activity of Christian missionaries, many of the Jews are becoming so "demoralized" that they know the New Testament better than they do their own Talmud.

An Interesting Celebration was held in the Forsyth Street Methodist Episcopal Church, New York, on March 10. It was the hundred and fifth anniversary of its existence. It was founded by Rev. Thomas Morrell, who was on Washington's staff.

A Press Dispatch to the New York Herald from Talbotton, Ga., says that C. S. Crawford, a citizen of Buena Vista, who has long been in the habit of scandalizing his neighbors by blasphemous utterances about God and the Bible, was talking in his usual strain on March 13 about there being no God, and defying him if he did exist, when a flash of lightning startled the company. It struck the atheist's house and set it on fire.

Texan Newspapers are Full of reports of the wonderful services held by Moody and Sankey in that State. At the meetings at Paris, in spite of a perfect deluge of rain, over three thousand persons were present. The only difference made by the storm was that there were more men than women in the audience, but there was not an inch of standing room unoccupied. The night meetings were quite as large, although the storm continued. Mr. Sankey's singing thrills the people, and they will stay to any hour, however late, on the chance of hearing one more song from him.

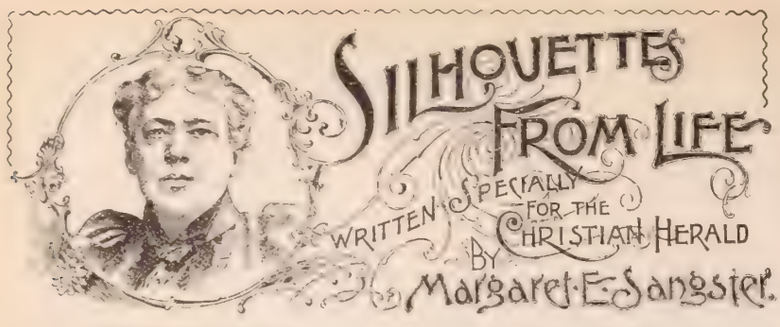
Church Members Seeking Employment or wishing to add to their income may hear of something to their advantage, by sending their names and addresses to Box J, Station D, New York.

Evangelist William E. Gell of Doylestown, Pa., has been holding successful meetings at Gloversville, N. Y. Large numbers of people from neighboring towns came to the meetings and prominent business men helped the Evangelist by closing their stores at an early hour to give their employes an opportunity of attending the meetings. A press dispatch says that over one thousand persons have made a profession of faith.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions has received from Hiroshima, the military headquarters of Japan, permission to send a number of able Japanese evangelists to the front as Christian workers for the army. This service may be sustained so long as the war continues. It is a part of the plan that permission be secured for a missionary to accompany or follow these Japanese. It is the first concession of the kind obtained by the Japanese Christians and marks an epoch in the progress of Christianity in Japan which may lead to important results after the war.

The Death of Dr. W. W. Scudder of Glastonbury, Conn., is announced. Dr. Scudder was a member of the celebrated missionary family of that name. He was born in Ceylon, and was graduated from Princeton in 1841. He was engaged in missionary work in India from 1840 to 1872. He had charge of the Congregational Church at Glastonbury from 1873 to 1884. He then returned to India, where he was in charge of the theological seminary at Arcot. Failing health compelled him to return to this country about eleven years ago.

Rev. Dr. M. D. C. Crawford, President of the New York Deaconess Home, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has received the gift of a United States bond worth $11,250, and check for $9,000, making $20,250, to be used toward securing a site or building in fee for the use of the society. It is sent by Mr. Leonard Wandell of New York, as executor of the estate of Mrs. Jane E. Kelemen. Mr. Wandell says: "Mrs. Kelemen was not a Methodist, though her mother was. By her will she left a large part of her estate to me without restriction of any kind. I believe, however, that by devoting the property to charitable and benevolent uses I carry out her wishes."



DOROTHY'S TEST.

DOROTHY MILLER held very strong opinions on the subject of temperance; indeed some of her acquaintances thought her a fanatic, and criticised her severely for the stand she took upon the safe ground of total abstinence. A beautiful girl was Dorothy, dark-eyed and oval-tinted with a firm, sweet mouth, and the graceful shape and lovely curves of a youthful Hebe. A girl one's eyes loved to rest upon, and one's ears to listen to.

She came from her country home when she was just twenty, to spend a year at her Aunt Carolyn's in town, and study art at the Student's Union. No idler was our village maiden. Accustomed to hard work and early rising, she was up in good season every day, and the moment breakfast and prayers were over, Dorothy was off, blithe as the morning, for a long session in the hall, where a class of earnest workers were studying the antique, under the care of one of the best masters of the period.

Before long, Dorothy's rare charm and quick wit made her very popular among her fellow students, and many weeks had not gone by, when she discovered that her own thoughts turned as naturally as flowers to the sun, towards one of her new friends, Hamilton Warwick, a tall, slender youth, with the carriage of an athlete, the head of an Apollo, and the golden hair and blue eyes that are the heritage of the Norseman.

Hamilton Warwick was a Nova Scotian, of Danish lineage on his mother's side. The days of the years of a man's life are swift and beautiful when as the poet says "his fancies lightly turn to thoughts of love," and Dorothy Miller was a prize worth seeking. She held herself aloof as maidens should, and for a long time her cool stateliness held Hamilton back, the while it made him more than ever resolved to win her. He was well known to Aunt Carolyn, whose friend his father had been, and she favored his suit. The weeks as they passed, revealed to him constantly some new enchantment in Dorothy's character and disposition. For her part, she experienced a pride and joy in the character of him who had taken possession of her soul, and when, one evening, the young man called, and, after an interview with her Aunt, formally proposed for her hand, Dorothy gave him no shy reluctant yes, but a gracious and womanly consent, which sent him home to his boarding-house, walking on air.

Yet there was one point in which these two did not agree, and where they could not mate.

In the delightful intimacy of an engaged couple, there was for some time no "little rift within the lute, that by and by should make the music mute." But one summer evening, Hamilton said lightly:

"Our class is to have its annual dinner next Thursday. There'll be great good luck if a man of us goes home sober."

Dorothy's shocked face looking into his, should have warned him; but quite oblivious of any danger signal in her flushed cheek, or steadfast eyes, the young man proceeded recklessly to his fate:

"Its the only time in the year that I ever indulge, pardon me, my darling, in such conviviality, and as when I am a grave married man, I'll have to give all such doings up, I'm going in for a good time with the fellows next week. Don't expect to see me next day at the Union, dearest, nor the day after, either! I'll turn up later all right, though."

"Are you in earnest, Hamilton? Because, if you are joking, the jest is in very poor taste. You surely never drink a social glass——"

"Why should I not be in earnest, Dora? I am in dead earnest. Do you suppose me such a muff that I am afraid to drink a glass of wine? A man with no will of his own? I know when to indulge, and I hope I know when to leave off, Dorothy. Of course I don't expect to drink to excess; that part was fun, but I shall certainly drink wine at the class dinner; I always have done so, and I won't be singular."

The glow faded from Dorothy's cheek, and her face grew sombre; so have I seen the light fade in the radiant sky, when over the sun floated an ominous thunder-cloud, with silvery lightnings hidden in its stormy breast.

"My friend," she said in a low voice, but with clear incisive accents, "I am glad this conversation has taken place here and now. Whatever you may think of me, Hamilton, I must tell you the truth: I will never marry a man who even moderately or occasionally drinks any sort of liquor. My convictions are unalterable, and I have been mistaken in you. The choice will have to be between social drinking and your bride, for, even at the altar, and before the minister, I would repudiate a man in whose temperance principles I had not full faith. You must choose, Hamilton!"

"The choice is apparently forced on me," said Hamilton, coldly, a demon of obstinacy awakened in him by her tone and manner. He went on icily hard: "Dearly and tenderly as I love you, Dorothy, I cannot submit to dictation of this sort. You have never shown this kind of temper before; it seems unlike you; may I be forgiven, if I say, it is unworthy of you, to be so narrow, and to make so much of a trifle. I cannot yield to the caprice of a moment when you are excited and stirred up. Think it over calmly, dearest. You have told me that you wanted a husband who could rule you, but you are setting out to rule me with a vengeance."

"Fortunately," said Dorothy, rising with a still, grave dignity, which well became her, "we are not yet irrevocably bound. You are not my husband, Mr. Warwick, nor am I your wife, and this discussion may as well end now. I return your ring, and I beg you to forget that we have ever been friends. Goodby."

Dorothy swept from the room, leaving Hamilton planted in the middle of the floor, the ring which she had given him held stupidly in his hand.

He was raging with anger and wounded vanity. In a moment he had seized his hat, the hall door banged as he passed through it, and he tore down the street at a pace which made passers-by turn and look at him.

"So!" he exclaimed, "This is the girl I have set my hopes on; one who will throw me over for a quibble. One who cares more for herself and her own silly prejudices than for a man's love and life. It is not as if I were a drunkard or likely to be one!"

The whole thing had happened in such a flurry of haste, that neither Dorothy nor Hamilton quite comprehended it. Both were "set," and one was wrong. One was absolutely and entirely right, as right as God's truth, and her house was builded on the everlasting rock of justice. But it almost broke her heart to abide there.

Away back in Dorothy's memory lived a picture, branded there forever, as by a red-hot iron.

It was of her father, idolized by his wife, her own devoted mother, who had mourned for him through Dorothy's childhood; this father brought home dead from the ford in which he had fallen from his horse, after a convivial supper one dark night. Drowned because of a social glass! Dorothy could never forget that, nor ever tolerate the possibility of her life's touching anywhere with one who was open to the temptations which had wrecked her mother's peace and happiness.

A girl who loves does not at once put love aside and the broken engagement wore upon Dorothy Miller, the more so that her Aunt Carolyn disapproved of her haste in the affair, and found great fault with her for lack of tact.

"A man should be managed, my love," she said, "won over, not knocked down with a club. One cannot order a man," she went on. But Dorothy held high her queenly little head.

"Aunty," she exclaimed, "The case is like the writing on the wall at Belshazzar's feast, 'Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin.' Hamilton has not stood my test. He has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. It is safe not to marry a man who tampers with drink. I cannot love any one who jests about a subject, which makes more misery than any other thing on the globe, which makes widows and orphans, and builds great fortunes with ruined souls as their foundation."

"Dorothy," said her aunt, testily, "You should join the Salvation Army. There is your place."

"Perhaps it is," answered Dorothy gravely. "Just now, painting pictures appears to be the Lord's appointment for me, however."

Let a friend of both parties finish the story.

"Last week," she said, "I saw Hamilton Warwick walking with his young wife, a gentle little creature who clung to his arm and looked proudly up into his face. He soon forgot Dorthy Miller you see. As they passed me, Judge V., who joined me on the promenade, shook his head and remarked:

"'I tremble for those young people. Warwick's a fine fellow in some ways, but the drink habit is gaining on him fast; it is so insidious, a man's will is enfeebled before he dreams of peril. And he comes, poor boy, of a hard-drinking, roistering line.'

"A little later," said the friend, "I met Dorothy. "She had on the garb of the Salvation lasses; in her hand she led a little child; her eyes shone, her step was free, her look was of strength and independence. She has given up her painting, but her pictures are sold at a good price, and it is only that she feels that she must in a more exclusive way, be about her Father's business. God bless Dorothy!"

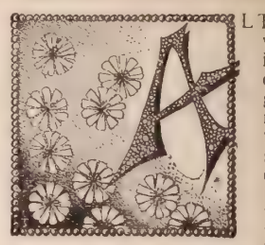
Closing the Fund's Work

Messages of Love and Gratitude to those who have Aided in the Relief Work



ALTHOUGH the work of relieving the sufferers is still progressing in many parts of the drought stricken States of the West, it is now in the hands of the local boards, acting under the direction of State or County Relief Committees. Comparatively few appeals are now received, and, for the present at least, the acute distress is abated. In Nebraska and Kansas, contributions are still coming in to the Relief Committees, and the present prospects, as we are advised, are that the seed contributions secured in other States will be the means of affording substantial aid to many thousands of farmers and their families. Manager Ludden, of the Nebraska Relief Commission, is investigating all new applications sent to him and affording prompt relief where the applicants are found to be deserving. A similar course is followed by the missionaries in South Dakota and Oklahoma, who have been supplied by means by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to relieve the most urgent and worthy cases.

Rev. J. H. Parker, of Kingfisher, Okla., Superintendent of Missions of the Congregational Home Missionary Society, writes:

I have just returned from a 150-mile ride into counties. I have secured helpers for the distribution of the monies sent me in these and several counties. I find a great deal of need and case all that can be put to this purpose. I think very will suffer for the want of clothing this spring some will want food and medicine.

Rev. C. M. Daley, Superintendent of Missions at Huron, S. Dak., writes:

I shall use my best judgment in the distribution of funds and will render an accounting if desired when all has been disposed of. . . . We find many who would have suffered, but for the efforts put forth. Nearly all our people are poor after the hard year, but many can get through the winter by depriving themselves of the usual comforts, while some will be helped to the necessaries of life. This latter class we have been trying to relieve, though not all cases are met. The need now is grain for feed and fuel, and money for groceries. Therefore your gifts are much appreciated. All excepting one county report that there is need, has provided a liberal amount of fuel and coal through the County Commissioners, has provided seed-grain which it will sell to those desiring, in limited quantities upon the individual's note, and beside this the churches have been very active in the work of supplying the needy, as well as the orders and societies, while individuals have helped their neighbors.

Rev. W. H. Thrall, also in South Dakota, writes:

I shall plan to assist more especially to secure garments essential to comfort, and to a suitable quantity of groceries to families. Thanking you in the name of the Master (Matt. 25: 35, 36).

From Kingfisher, Okla., Rev. John Palmer, Secretary of the Oklahoma Conference, writes:

I have reason to feel that many hearts will be truly grateful for this timely assistance. I will be glad to report the distribution of the Fund in proper time.

The Denver "Republican" has practically closed its relief work in Colorado. The Fund (which was originally started by a contribution from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Fund) has reached nearly $5,000, of which $130 still remains to be expended in supplying seed grain to the farmers of the drought belt. In less than six weeks the "Republican" collected and sent into thirty-eight different districts in ten counties vast quantities of relief stores, which were the means of aiding several thousand families and preventing great suffering.

The Topeka "Capital's" Relief Fund in Kansas has now nearly reached $5000. Excellent work is being done. Editor Hudson of the "Capital," writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

The car load of clothing, containing packages for various destinations, has been received and the name of many needy and deserving people have thank you very much for your generous gift in their behalf. I think this consignment, together what we have been able to gather in Kansas, sufficient clothing to supply the urgent necessities the people. There is no doubt but what the many urgent cases of individual necessity cannot be reached by us through the county but this method that we have pursued has generally satisfactory, and many warm letters thanks have been received from the western the State, from the recipients of aid. I have chased only the staple articles of food such as meal, beans, etc. I can buy these articles cheaper in this market than anywhere else in this and as they are transported free by the railroads secures for the people the largest amount of the of the money generously contributed.

Late contributions to the Fund are acknowledged in the adjoining column.

NEW BOOKS.

A DICTIONARY OF HISTORY.*

FEW books will be more warmly welcomed by all who are in the habit of using volumes of reference, than this new and comprehensive Dictionary of United States History, by Prof. Jameson of Brown University. An acknowledged authority on all matters historical, Prof. Jameson has brought to his task a special familiarity with his subject and a ripe scholarship as well. In his preface he explains that usefulness has been the foremost consideration during the progress of the work. In order that such a book of reference should be useful, it is necessary that it should be, first, comprehensive, and secondly, accurate. Great pains have been taken to make it accurate, and it is hoped that the efforts thus made have not been without effect. The histories of other parts of America, or of the world, are included only in so far as they have some relation to United States history. Within the field thus defined, articles will, it is believed, be found upon nearly all important subjects. The following classes of subjects included may be specified: political occurrences of various sorts; wars and insurrections; battles, and even important skirmishes, in all our wars, including sieges and sieges: colonies and settlements upon any part of our present territory; colonizing companies; the several States and Territories; those cities and towns which may fairly be called historic, or whose importance on other grounds makes their history interesting; famous old manors, houses and communities; political parties and factions; political terms which have played a prominent part in American history; departments of government, offices, courts and institutions, Federal, State, colonial or local; Indian tribes that have had a history; famous trips; noted legal cases of historic importance, such as constitutional cases decided by the Supreme Court or fugitive slave cases; historic laws, British and American; treaties with foreign countries and, under the name of each such country, the history of our diplomatic relations with that government; colleges, universities, libraries and other educational institutions; learned societies, especially those devoted to historical studies; famous historical publications; newspapers, especially those which were earliest published in the country, or in their respective States; coins; historic songs, etc. One class, larger than any of those yet mentioned, deserves a more explicit reference; namely, biographical subjects. Effort has been made to include a brief article on the life of every man and woman who has played a considerable part in the public life of the colonies or United States, either in the civil or the military and naval departments. Names eminent solely in literature and science, names of artists, divines and merchants, have naturally been less fully represented and more briefly stated. Historical writers have been more frequently represented than others. Finally, besides Americans, many Britons and other foreigners—monarchs, ministers, generals and others—are included because they had much to do with United States history.

The Dictionary is well printed, copiously illustrated and substantially bound and makes altogether a very desirable addition to any reference library or for all who desire special and accurate information in topics relating to American history.

THEY THAT WAIT FOR HIM.

Warnings and Encouragements to Christ's Waiting People in his Messages by John to the Seven Churches.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

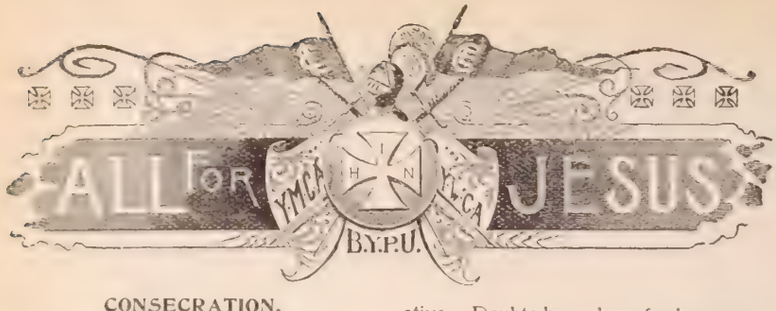
JOHN saw that the church in all her declension was not abandoned. The seven churches were still in the hand of Christ in glory (Rev. 1: 20.) But there was much besides which he had to see. Just as Israel had failed to be to him "for a people and for a name and for a praise and for a glory" (Jer. 13: 2), and the Lord dealt with the faithful remnant (Rom. 11: 5-7), so the church had failed to become a people for his name, but he should lead on, in the midst of an unfaithful church another remnant, the overcomers of Rev. 2:3. When the Word of God speaks of a church we can only conceive of a company of such as know the Lord, believers, and the aged apostle had to know fellowship with Christ's sufferings when he became his messenger to an Ephesus which had left her first love, a Pergamos which contained the terrible uncleanness of the teaching of Balaam, a Thyatira which cherished the very spirit of Jezebel in her bosom, a Sardis which had a name to live and was dead, a Laodicea whose lukewarmness was such that the Lord, who held her in his hand, was ready to spue her out of his mouth, and yet she was full of pride and self-complacency! How could it be possible for the Son of God to unite himself in closest oneness to a church with such characteristics? It could not be. How can a self pleasing, self-exalting church be one with him whom she resembles so little? But John saw and was charged with messages to those who were the exceptions in the churches, those who in Ephesus had also retained and were deepened in their first love, those who in a church like Thyatira had maintained a life and works of quite a different order from those around them, unhindered by the unpropitious atmosphere in which God had permitted them to be. These had no works of their own of which to boast, but they had overcome and kept his works to the end, they being his simple instruments; and to those which have stood with him he promises no less a portion than his own. "To him that overcometh will I give authority over the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron [that is to share his own rule, Ps. 2: 9] as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers, as I also received of my Father." (Rev. 2: 26, 27.) No less a portion that's his very own, is not this a promise to his bride?

And the overcomer in the church of Laodicea, perhaps the most difficult of all. A church knowing all, having all, doing all outwardly, and yet neither cold nor hot, and ignorant of her true condition! In just such a state of things and while there are loved ones whom the Lord rebukes and chastens, his coming is at the door: "Behold I stand at the door, and knock." And "he that overcometh, to him will I give to sit with me on my throne." The same promise intrinsically as to Thyatira, oneness in the throne in rule, in judgment with himself, the place only possible for the Bride. The scoffers may mock on, but the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. An unprepared church will hinder him no more. There are, in all lands, and in all churches, some overcomers whom he will join with the overcomers already in glory when he comes, and then the five wise virgins will awake from their slumber, the sleeping church will awake, and the coming of the Lord for his church will be no longer an opinion but a tremendous fact for those who are left behind. He is coming, and they shall not be ashamed that wait for him.



CONSECRATION.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing April 7. Ezra 3: 1-17.

WHAT are Christ's claims on his followers? To answer the question it is necessary to consider what he does for them. The story is often told of an English traveler making a voyage on board a Moorish vessel on which were some slaves who were being carried to a port where they were to be sold. They were naturally deeply concerned about the character of the men who would buy them. The Englishman became deeply interested in one of them who showed more intelligence than the others and he bargained with the Captain for his purchase. Not until the transaction was completed and the money paid over was the slave informed that he had a new owner. "I thought," he said, "that Englishmen did not own slaves." When told that his owner had bought him to set him free, he fell on his knees and vowed that he would serve him faithfully till the day of his death. If this gratitude proved pemanent what would there be of his time, or service, or any property that he was able to accumulate, that would be withheld from the use of the man who had emancipated him, if it was required? Another incident is told that illustrates the idea of complete consecration. An open boat on the wide sea was crowded with all that were saved from a burned ship. There were more persons in the boat than was safe, and besides there was not a sufficient food supply for many days. After consultation the more hard-hearted men had their way and it was agreed that a man should be thrown overboard each day until the number was reduced to a safe basis, or a ship was sighted. The sacrifice was to be chosen by lot, and the first lot was cast. Before the victim was thrown out, his brother, who was in the boat, offered himself to die in his place. After some objection on the part of the man on whom the lot had fallen, the offer was accepted and the brother was thrown into the sea. But the love of life was strong and he swam after the boat. Becoming exhausted he rested his hands on the side of the boat. An inhuman sailor raised an axe and cut them off. Then humanity made itself heard. The people in the boat declared they would live or die together, and they took the swimmer into the boat and bound up his wounds. The next day a vessel was sighted and they were saved. What claim had the maimed man on the brother whose place he took? He could never work for himself, but might he not depend on his brother who owed his life to him? Neither incident fully represents our obligation to Christ, but they help us to form an idea of its extent. It is not to be measured by anything that can be given or done for him. Time, talents, property—all are mortgaged. We owe him all that we are and have. Nothing is too precious to relinquish in his interest, or to devote to his service.

THE COMING CONFERENCE.

As the time for holding the great National Epworth League conference at Chattanooga approaches, the ideas of what it will be, have to be continually readjusted. There has been a long breathing spell since the last conference, and during the time the League has made prodigious strides. The Southern League has sprung into being with its band of enthusiastic, devoted officers, and in the north the numbers of new Leagues and the numbers of members of old Leagues have multiplied beyond the most sanguine expectation. The delegations to Chattanooga, if at all representative, will be an imposing gathering, and the evidences are all in favor of them being fully representative. Doubts have been freely expressed as to the possibility of the city accommodating all who attend; but the Chattanooga brethren have set to work with a systematic energy that sets all such doubts at rest. They have organized an excellent executive committee to make all arrangements, and their plans, so far as they have been disclosed, show that they are fully prepared for the work. On this page we give portraits of four of the officers of the Committee: the Chairman, Secretary, Treasurer and the lady member whose arduous duty it is to provide homes for the delegates. The originality of the plans adopted by the committee may be inferred from the fact that one of them is for a grand camp on Lookout Mountain. We do not know if there is to be any competitive examination for participation in that hospitality, but we can imagine that in Tennessee in June the candidates for it will exceed the number of places. It will be a great and memorable Conference.

THE B. Y. P. U. APPEAL.

The Executive Committee of the Baptist Young People's Union has issued an appeal to the churches, which will, or ought to, find a response in every church that has the interest of the denomination at heart. The Committee asks that a Sunday be devoted to the subject of the Young People's Union, the pastor preaching on the duty of the Church to the young people to train them for usefulness, and outlining the principles of the Union as a means to that end. It is also suggested that prayer-meetings be held for a blessing on the Union and that in the evening there should be meetings of the young people themselves for consultation and consecration. Beside this, and to round out the day in practical shape that collections be taken up for the benefit of the national work. The Executive Committee has not yet obtained the whole of the fund of fifty thousand dollars, which it requires for the proper equipment in journalism and other departments of its work, and it asks the churches to make a liberal contribution to the fund, which is called the Founding Fund. The day suggested for the duty is April 21, and the Committee hopes that it will become an annual red-letter day under the title of Founders' Day. It undertakes to supply suggestive programmes, including music for the use of any church, which will adopt the idea and take up a collection. It will also provide copies of a synopsis, outlining the Christian Culture Courses for pastors, who have not kept up with the march of events sufficiently to be already familiar with those courses of study. Both kinds of literature may be obtained free on application to the headquarters of the Committee, 122 Wabash avenue, Chicago.

THE Y. W. C. A. AND THE CHILDREN.

The Women's Christian Association of Kingston, Ontario, has for some time past been doing a work among the children of the city which may furnish a suggestion to Associations in other cities. Miss A. M. Machar, who describes it in "The International Messenger," reports that it is having a very beneficial influence in the homes of the poor. She says: We had been thinking of the needs of a number of younger girls than our members—girls of from eight to twelve, who were fast growing up to be young women without some of the most necessary training for their future lives. Owing to the absence of any provision for teaching sewing in the public schools, they were growing up in ignorance of this most necessary art, while in household work they were quite as untaught. The sewing class was first opened, and the elementary class soon made good progress under the superintendence of Miss Chestnut, our missionary agent. She was aided by a number of young ladies; for the superintendence of so many beginners required the aid of several assistants. After the elementary class had made good progress, an advanced class was formed of the older girls, who wished to learn how to cut out and make some of their own clothing. We encouraged the children by occasional little rewards, a tea-party now and then, and an annual excursion and picnic, all of which are greatly enjoyed. The classes begin with the singing of a hymn, and sometimes, a little story is read to them.

Our attempt at a kitchen-garden began in a very simple way. Mrs. Ross, one of our Vice-Presidents, seeing how often the girls were allowed to live in ignorance of the simplest elements of good cooking, undertook to teach eight little girls to cook a certain number of simple dishes, such as porridge, gruel, nourishing soup, stew, hot cakes, etc. Each pupil was expected to take part in the actual work and was always allowed to take home a portion of the article which she helped to prepare. It was gratifying to know that some, if not all the girls thus taught, were pleased to carry out the results of this instruction at home and in one case, the knowledge thus gained proved of real use to a sick mother.

THE Y. P. S. C. E. AMONG INDIANS.

The problem which has perplexed one Administration after another, and has distressed the Christian people throughout the land by its grievous anomalies, appears to be brought nearer to solution by the operation of the Christian Endeavor movement. The "Golden Rule" has received from S. C. Gilman a report of the beneficial results already achieved among the Indians through the agency of the society. It says: "Christian Endeavor is helpful to dispel the bitter race prejudice that always exists on the frontier between the white settlers and the Indians. Members of the Indian Christian Endeavor Society, white teachers, and native missionaries have organized a Sunday School among the settlers living just south of the Indian country. Here, in a little schoolhouse, on Sunday afternoons may be found a meeting where the "race problem" has been solved. Indians and white people have met as Christian brethren, all eager to learn the words of the one Master.

"One of the most discouraging phases of the Indian work is that, when the Indian young men and women leave the schools and return to dwell upon the reservation sometimes they fall back into the old, wild condition. But Miss Burr, of Pine Ridge tells of two young returned students, as they are called, who did not go back "unto their gods" and the ways of their people but immediately set about organizing, in the heart of a reservation where the Indians (the Ogallallahs) are the wildest), a society that had helped them to attain to much better things. She says, 'The Christian Endeavor Society at Pine Ridge was formed about a year and a half ago, by two young Teton Indians, upon their return from the school in Wabash, Ind., where there is a Society, with which they had been indentified.'

"From Mrs. F. B. Riggs, of the Santee Agency, it was learned that while the schools are closed during the summer, the children frequently write letters from the homes to the teachers, in which the Christian Endeavor meetings and other good influences thrown about them are mentioned and a desire is expressed to return to school.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Epworth League Conference, of the Tennessee Conference, will be held at Winchester, Tenn., April 24-26. It promises to be one of unusual interest. A number of prominent League workers have already been secured.

At the chapel on Cob Dock, Brooklyn Navy Yard, on March 17, one hundred and fifty sailors attended the religious service conducted by the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor from the Greene Avenue Presbyterian Church.

Four hundred delegates attended the recent State Convention of the Epworth League, Appleton, Wis. President Chapman strongly advocated the holding of a Summer School for League workers. It is believed that on the borders of one of the lakes a school might be held each year.

A prominent Brooklyn preacher recently said he did not wish the denominational fences removed, but wanted them lowered so that he could reach over and shake hands with brothers on the other side. The Secretary of the English Christian Endeavor Union puts the same idea in another form, making the change in the people instead of the fences. He says: "Not that denominational fences are being broken down, but the Christian Endeavorers are growing so tall that they can look over the fences and recognize the oneness in Christ of Christians of every name."

The Young Men's Christian Association at Crawfordsville, Ind., has been passing through a crisis. The building was the property of a banker, who became insolvent, and it was turned over to the administrators to satisfy creditors. The banker had intended to donate the building to the Association before his bankruptcy, but the purpose was not carried out. The official went around among the friends of the Association in the city and secured sufficient funds to purchase the building for $13,2[illegible] when it was put up at auction. It cost $45,000 when it was built five years ago.

The King's Daughters and Sons of Pennsylvania are doing a quiet but great work. They report now about a thousand Circles, not including the great number not registered. On May 8th and 9th they are to hold their first State Convention in Philadelphia, which promises to be a great success. The programme announces several well known speakers, and not a little of King's Daughters' work but has a place in some unique form. This Convention is a necessary result of the increasing growth of the Order in Pennsylvania. Mrs. Frank M. Goodchild of Philadelphia, is the leader of the work in the State.

A Royal Eastern Wedding.

The Nuptials of Princess Hadidja Hanem and Prince Abbas Pasha Halim.

ALTHOUGH social life in the Orient is doubtless tame and uneventful, by contrast with the conditions that prevail in our own country or in Europe, yet it has its "red-letter" days. For the women of the East, these have a special interest, since they usually relate to some one of the very few functions in which the sex publicly participates. A birth, a betrothal, a wedding or a funeral each furnishes an opportunity for the exercise of womanly tenderness, hospitality or sympathy, and some of them for the display of toilettes and adornments of a character that would excite amazement as well as admiration in all not familiar with the usages and customs of Eastern lands.

One of the most notable social events of recent years in Egypt was the wedding of the beautiful and accomplished Princess Hadija Hanem, the sister of the Khedive, to Prince Abbas Pasha Halim, which was celebrated in the ancient city of Cairo. Our illustration (taken from a sketch made from life by Madame Philippoteaux for the London "Graphic"), shows the bride's procession forming in the interior of her royal home, where she has passed a portion of her life in the company of young Egyptian girls of her own age and in the care of tutors and instructors; for it must not be imagined that even the princesses of Egypt, in these days of progress, are permitted to remain in ignorant of modern feminine accomplishments. On this felicitous occasion, the Princess Hadidja was dressed with royal magnificence, in a robe of rose-colored silk, trimmed with gold lace. On her head was a crown of diamonds, from which hung a gauze veil bordered with threads of gold, and a gold ribbon bound her hair. Her train was carried by two pages, and two exceedingly pretty girls — the Princesses Ulie and Bedia, daughters of Prince Osman and cousins of the bride—were the bridesmaids. They wore white dresses ornamented with pearls. At the head of the procession walked a band of musicians belonging to the Khedive's court and these were followed by a company of Circassian girls, who sang in Turkish, accompanying themselves on tambourines. The bride, her maids, pages, and relatives followed, and at the proper place met the bridegroom's procession, according to custom, after which the formal ceremony took place.

During the week of festivities, Cairo was the scene of much gayety. Its entire population seemed to share in the general rejoicing. At Koobeh, the residential palace of the Khedive's family, all the representatives of foreign governments were invited with their wives and families, and the Khedive's brother, Prince Mohammed Ali Pasha, acted as host, as the peculiar etiquette of the country forbade the Khedive to officially act in that capacity. All the palace grounds were brilliantly illuminated, evenings, and games and amusements were held in marquees erected specially for the occasion.

While these rejoicings were going on, the ladies of Cairo were enjoying special privileges at the Palace, where the Khediviah Mother received them and presented them to the bride. A multitude of costly presents had arrived and these, consisting chiefly of very valuable jewely, were displayed to the delighted female guests. Small gold coins were occasionally flung among the visitors by the Khediviah herself, and for those there was a merry scramble at times. Every lady who secured one of the souvenirs doubtless regarded herself as a very fortunate person indeed, and the coins will probably be handed down to coming generations as memorials of the pleasant time they spent in the palace at Koobeh at the wedding of pretty Princess Hadidja.

Busybodies.

There are two species of busybodies; one heedlessly liable to pass on a piece of news, letting the tongue wag simply from unrestrained habit, and others with a purpose to injure. The latter, as a matter of course, fall under the condemnation of all decent people. How easily an innocent reputation may be blasted, and without opportunity of defense or reparation, by ugly gossip, based on unfounded rumor. Pondering on these things, as well as upon the expectation of having to account for every idle word, a Christian will surely be "slow to speak."

Care of the Young Eyes.

Never let your children read in a room where there is not plenty of light. Light is the best food of the eye. Visit the schoolroom, and see to it that your child's desk is in a position where he will not have to strain his eyes and use them up before adult age comes on. Plenty of physical exercise between hours of study is a good thing for the eyes as well as for the rest of the body. In the French public schools 24.2 per cent. of the scholars are short-sighted; in the German 35 per cent., and in the English only 20 per cent. According to M. Martin, in the "Journal de Medicine de Bordeaux," the percentage is highest in the rhetoric and philosophy classes. The hygienic condition of the school does not seem to affect the percentage, and he thinks the want of physical exercise is the cause of the trouble. By modifying the work of the classes the proportion of short-sighted scholars at the College of Giessen has fallen from 26.6 to 17 percent in five years.

A Bible-reading Court.

In a recent issue THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recorded the presentation of a Bible by the Christians of China to the Empress-dowager on the occasion of her sixtieth birthday. That gift has already, it appears, produced a most remarkable result. A correspondent, writing to friends abroad, says: "The Empress-widow at once began reading in the Bible. The Emperor, thereupon, also asked to be given a copy of the Book, but as the Empress-dowager did not care to part with her Bible, she sent a messenger to the depot of the American Bible Society to purchase for him another copy of the Old and New Testament. The messenger was given the books, but came to exchange them some time after for larger type. The messenger received the Catechism and a copy of the Book of Proverbs as a present, and promised to let the other officials of the palace read in them." Since the Emperor received his Bible he also has begun to read and the officials at the royal court have also taken up the study of "the book of the cult of Jesus," as it is called by Chinese scholars. What results may flow from this newly-awakened interest in the Bible and its teaching cannot now be foreseen, but the circumstances afford cause for the highest hopes. If "a nation may be born in a day," it would be a glorious illustration of the convincing power of Christianity were China, through the gift of a few believers, to be ultimately won for Christ in our day.

THE DEEDS OF THE DAY.

IF we sit down at set of sun
And count the things that we have done
And counting find
One self-denying act, one word
That eased the heart of him who heard,
One glance most kind
That fell like sunshine where it went,
Then we may count the day well spent.

But if through all the livelong day
We've eased no heart by yea or nay;
If through it all
We've done no thing that we can trace
That brought the sunshine to a face;
No act, most small,
That helped a soul and nothing cost,
Then count that day as worse than lost.

KINDNESS TO ANIMALS.

SOME time ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published a short article from Dr. Talmage's pen, directed against the ruthless and unnecessary slaughter of birds. The facts it set forth regarding the extent of the wholesale massacre of feathered innocents—whether for the purpose of subserving the prevailing cruel fashion of utilizing them as ornaments for feminine headgear or otherwise—seem to have received the warm approbation of many readers. A lady writes from Connecticut as follows:

"Right across the street live five young men, or big boys, brought up to go to church, but as the fashion of the times is getting with them, they seldom go to any meeting, and just go around here with noiseless rifles, further off with double-barrelled rifles, dogs and ferrets, and every pretty, useful, innocent, wild thing falls before them. They are not hungry, but just kill for the fun of the thing, and to show their skill. There is not as much mercy in their hearts as in the gneiss or trap rock around us.

"I am a woman of seventy, and brought up those under my charge to scorn hunting, but my father and mother belonged here, and would tell of twenty species of birds they knew well, now entirely gone.

"The snow continuing has shown rabbit tracks plainly, and so active have been the sportsmen that I hardly think a wild rabbit or a blue jay is left in the country. A young lady once told me that the legs of eighteen yellow hammers made a very good meal. She was not a welcome visitor after it. Lack of fruit and vegetables is laid mostly to the destruction of the insect pests, which sting my dahlia buds, make slugs on my roses, and even the asters were covered on their flowers last summer with slender bugs half an inch or more long, which nothing but arsenic would kill. (These pests were formerly kept down by the birds.)

"Voices are raised in plenty against all other forms of vice, but seldom a word against this, which bids fair to leave our land like a desolate wilderness, and all the squirrels gone."

Our correspondent's humane letter will find an echo in many a heart, among those who love the birds and would avert their destruction if possible.

Early Habits of Industry.

The value of time and the need of habits of industry should be early enforced. In simple communities this is perhaps more generally understood than in large cities. Little maids of Germany and Switzerland are taught to do many useful things while still mere children. The sphere of women in the Shetland Islands is well defined. The "wee lassie" is early taught to "hae somethin' in her hand." Her hands must be kept busy, and this is done by teaching her the art of knitting, which will more than likely serve as her occupation from the cradle to the grave. The most important work done by these women consists in the knitting of fine shawls which take their name from the islands. These shawls are the principal articles knitted, but veils, different kinds of underwear, as well as fancy articles, are all made, and when "dressed," as the cleaning process is called, are marketed. The main point with us should be not so much to exact labor from the young folks or to deprive them of any legitimate recreations, as to bring them gradually and pleasantly into the practice of doing such work as will be serviceable, instead of spending leisure time in mere idleness.

Young Mothers

should early learn the necessity of keeping on hand a supply of Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk for nursing babies as well as for general cooking. It has stood the test for 30 years, and its value is recognized.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER V.

A Hard Struggle.

VERY present to the minds of both Alice and her mother, on the morning when we first made their acquaintance, were the events narrated in the foregoing chapters. Everything around them in the two dingy rooms on the third floor of the tenement-house reminded them of the calamities that had fallen upon them with lightning-like rapidity.

And they were alone. It would not have been near so dreary if Will had been with them. That is the worst curse of poverty that it involves so often the break-up of families, the separation of those who love each other. Will was reluctant to go and his mother and sister were sorry to have him go; but in the little family council there was no disentient voice when the situation was considered. Reason said he should go as plainly as love bade him stay, and like the strong, sensible young man he was, he obeyed reason.

The situation was very plain. Nothing could be saved from the financial wreck. No one knew anything of Mr. Mapleton's business affairs besides Mr. Jackson, and he said all was lost. Perhaps the time would come when Mr. Jackson's conduct would be investigated, but that time was not come. The only thing that did seem to be of any value was a certificate of shares in a New Mexican mine. Mr. Mapleton had given the paper to his wife two years before, on her birthday. She took it laughingly with some light words and he had said almost in joke, "Perhaps it is worth more than you think." But at that time there was no lack of money, and Mrs. Mapleton put it away and thought no more about it. She had forgotten its existence until she found it in the desk when she was packing up some old letters and a few relics of her young life, to leave her palatial home for the humble tenement to which she must go, She showed it to Will and he, after some inquiries, found that with these shares as leverage, he could get an appointment then open at the mines and could aid in their development. No other opening for him could be found and as he felt he must do something, he started for New Mexico immediately.

Thus mother and daughter were left to struggle alone. Really its brunt fell on Alice's young shoulders, for Mrs. Mapleton's nervous system collapsed under the stress and storm. At her age, the blows fell with killing force, for she had lost the elasticity of temperament which came to her daughter's support in the trial. And she did not know the worst difficulty in their way. Alice kept from her knowledge the fact of the persecution she had to suffer from Mr. Jackson. That man was determined to have her for his wife and he believed that the surest way to win her was to make her life so hard and bitter that she would be glad to give up the struggle and have him provide for her and her mother.

Alice had a shrewd idea of his plan. With a woman's intuition, she divined the origin of her disappointments and trials. She knew why she lost one situation after another; why they were politely requested to vacate rooms just when they had become used to them, for he would always appear at the darkest moment and renew his offer, only to be spurned by the brave girl; and on each of these occasions he would leave her with more chagrin and with the sinister prediction that worse trials would come upon her, and would not cease to come till she yielded. Alice hid all these things from her mother, but what nearly drove the poor girl frantic was that when they were in the deepest distress her mother would moan, "Oh, my child! if you had only been kinder to Mr. Jackson, if you had married that good man, things would not be as they are."

Sometimes Alice would lose patience and answer: "No, I should be in my grave," but generally she would only say: "Oh, you poor blind mother!"

Alice was in hopes that in her last move she had hidden herself from her ruthless pursuer, but she was in the last extremity; there was no money in the house, she had even visited the pawn shop and had pawned every little trinket and article of clothing that would bring a dollar.

She had found Mr. Jacobs the pawnbroker, such a kind, old man, so different from what she had expected a pawnbroker to be from what she had read about them that she had lost that feeling of dread and sense of humiliation and horror that she had felt on her first visit. He was a German Jew, with white hair and long, white beard, and a benevolent-looking countenance. This morning, before her mother was awake, she had taken the family Bible, the only thing she could find that could bring money enough to get food for the day.

"How much vas you expect to get? I mean, how much do you vant pretty bad?"

"Just what you can give me; you always treat me kindly."

"Vell, you vas deefrent from dem oder peoples, vat I do beesness mit, you vas a lady, a real lady, vat has some troubles. You vas brave and fight for your sick moder, you vas honest and mean to redeem everytings ven you get some money, and I keep everyting till you are able. I take dem ting 'cause it is beesness and make you feel independent; but ven you has nothing vat you can bring, you come to old Jacobs all de same, he let you have a leetle."

"You have been very kind to me, and I will never forget it."

"Vell, dat is vere you vas deefrent from some oder peoples; dey forget pretty quick, and the more you do for dem, de more dey don't like you. No, I vas not kind to you, but dere vas two ways to do beesness. Von vay is to look out for number von; noder vay is to look out for number von and your customer too; dat is de vay I do beesness mit you, and if all customers vas honest, dere be not so many rogues in our beesness. Dere is tree dollars on dat book; I would not give von dollar to anybody else, 'cos I could not get anyting for it if I sell it, but it is worth everyting to you and I keep it."

"I may be able to pay you back all the money I have received, but I shall never be able to pay you all I owe."

"Vell, now we got so we know von anoder pretty well, would you mind if I ask you von or two tings, so perhaps I could help you and get some trouble off my mind?"

"I will answer any questions and not take offence, as I know you are seeking my welfare."

"Dot vas right. Vell, ven vas your rent due?"

"On next Saturday; but I fear I shall not have it, but I think I have a situation to give drawing lessons, and I am going to ask the agent to let me have a day or two. Do you think he will?"

"Yes, I know he will, 'cos I own de building, so you can feel easy about dot. Now do you know anybody vat vas your enemy, any man who would try to do you some harm?"

"Oh, Mr. Jacobs, has he found me again? He ruined my father, he drove my brother away from the city, and he followed me with the malignity of a fiend. It is through him that I am driven to the straits in which I find myself. He is determined to ruin me, because I would not become his wife."

Alice was very pale and trembled from head to foot.

"Dot vas make it all plain; don't you marry him he is a villain; and if he bodder you some more you come to old Jacobs and he will stand by you. Now, I tells you why I ask you dem questions. My agent tell me that a grand chentleman come to him, he wear a silk hat and kid gloves, and he ask about dem rooms and say he will give big rent if he shall have ze rooms next week. Don't be frightened, my dear, I tell him not to have dose, or any oder rooms if he will offer one tousand dollars."

Oh, Mr. Jacobs, how can I thank you? I have never known a want in my life before; I had hundreds of friends, but when adversity came they left, and I have received more acts of kindness from the poor and those we used to think beneath us, than all the fine friends I used to think so good and was so proud of."

"Yes, my tear, goodness in dis world is like de leetle salt vat you put in de porridge, it go all troo and sometimes as much if not a leetle more get down to de bottom, than is on de top."

"Now, Mr. Jacobs, you have been so candid with me I must tell you that I did not give you my real name; my name is not Brown."

"I vas not suppose dot it vas, my tear, dot vas noting."

"But I must tell you—"

Just then some customers entered the place, and Alice left by the side door.

"Ve vill talk dot all over some oder time," said Mr. Jacobs as he bowed her out.

CHAPTER VI.

A Shower Bath.

The next morning after Alice had had her confidential chat with Mr. Jacobs, she left her room feeling more hopeful than usual. Her mother was better; she had found a friend in the good old Jew, and she had secured the position at Mrs. Wilson's to teach the three young ladies. She left her mother in the front room, and carefully closed the doors so that her mother would not be troubled with draughts or noise; she had taken two or three steps down the stairs, when she stopped as if paralyzedf and felt as if she had been turned into stone, for at the foot of the stairs was Mr. Jackson coming up. As soon as she could move she retreated to the landing, and facing him, barred his way.

"So I have found you again, Alice? Your other lovers are not as faithful in their search, or they care less for the object they pretend to be hunting for."

"Some people have more of the nature of the bloodhound, I admit," said Alice. "Will you please state your business as I am in a hurry."

"Well, I have called to see if you have had enough of the slums, and were ready to surrender."

"As I have told you before, I shall never surrender; and I would rather live among these honest but poor people, in the most abject poverty than in a palace with you; and after your persecution I would rather be torn limb from limb than be your wife."

Alice was so indignant that she looked like a beautiful young tigress.

"Well, this will be my last call here," he said with a sneer. "I will call on you next in the poor-house, or the jail,—but I will step inside and see your mother and your luxurious apartments, as I understand you will leave them this week."

"For once you will find yourself foiled, for we shall not leave them."

"Well, my dear, step out of the way for I intend going in."

"Do not dare to take another step," cried Alice. Mr. Jackson was three steps below her, and how she intended preventing him from entering the room she hardly knew, but just as he came up another step, and was about to thrust her aside, a door opened on the opposite side of the hall, and a stalwart Irish woman with a bucket in her hand, stepped out.

"Ye dirty thafe o' the wurild, phat are ye insulting the beautiful young lady fur? If ye take another shtep up, faith, ye'll go down the hull of them shtairs quicker nor lightning."

"Who are you?" asked Jackson.

"Who am I is none of your business, but I'm a dacent woman, and that's more than can be said of you for a man."

"Well," said Jackson with a sneer, "I called on this young friend and pal of yours ——"

"Now shtop yer dirty mouth, ye blathering spalpeen. I never shpoke to the young lady in my life; I wouldn't presume, for I knew that she was a born lady as soon as I set eyes on her, just as quick as I knew that you were a villain, and I never push myself into the company of my betters, like you, ye snake."

"Well, go and mind your own busines I didn't call on all the paupers in the hous if I did condescend to call on one."

"Did ye ever hear the loikes o' tha Paupers, is it? Ugh! ye black heart ould haythen, to come here calling dace people paupers, and that pure young cre ture, too, that's as much above ye as saint is above the devil. Attend to my ov business, is it? Faith, that's what I'm g ing to do; I was going to empty this buck of dish water, and shure I couldn't find dirtier place than that to put it;" and li lightning the whole was emptied on top Mr. Jackson's head. "Take that, ye dir dog, it was a washin' ye needed, and bed ye've got it, and if ye come back, fait I'll wring ye out."

The force of the deluge sent Mr. Jacks staggering down two or three steps, the water striking him in a compact bo on the top of his silk hat, drove it do over his eyes and flowed over the rim li a circular cascade. Never, perhaps, wa fastidiously dressed gentleman changed t dilapidated-looking tramp so quickly befo He stood a most forlorn-looking creatu with his arms hanging down, the dirty w ter dripping from the tips of his light k gloves, and a long paring of a potato cau on his gold watch-chain. He was spee less because he had no breath left, not ev enough to energize an expletive. As so as he had recovered sufficiently from astonishment he poured out a volley abuse.

"If I hear another bad word out of dirty mouth in the presence of this you lady, I'll send the bucket after the wate and the enraged woman swung the buc over her head.

Mr. Jackson had sufficient sense left know that this woman would be as g as her word, and was not to be trifled wi so he hobbled down the stairs, as well he could, and when out of range, shou back: "I'll have you in jail in less than hour, you vixen."

Alice had stood all this time with hands raised, and a look of horror on face. At last she drew a long breath said: "My good woman, you must not yourself into trouble on my account; is a bad man—he will get you arrest then what should I do?"

"Now don't be angry wid me, miss didn't give him half what he deserved, if my man had only been home he woul broke his ugly jaw for him."

"Oh, I am not angry with you; I deeply grateful," said Alice. "What sh I have done if you had not come to my cue? He has done everything a mean unscrupulous man could do to injure and mine, and now I fear he will in you?"

"Och, didn't I know that he was a lain the moment I sot eyes on his wick looking face? But don't trouble your about me, and don't worry your gentle tle heart, shure, what can he do? He have me took up, and if he does, I'll him such a tongue-lashing before the ju as will make him wish that he had let alone. But I'll not have you called or account, so don't fear that you would h to go to court."

"Oh, but I must go, if they take you show that what you did was in my defe Nothing could keep me away," said A

"God bless the child! Shure, I k that you was a born lady the mome clapped eyes on ye, and I knew it wa sick mother that ye were caring for, a knew that ye had had throuble by the b dress ye wore, and by your living in house along with the loikes of us, a didn't presume to spake to ye, but I say my man, says I, 'that gentle young crea has more to carry than her delicate sho ers can bear,' and says he, 'I believe Mary, but what can the loikes of us d help the loikes o' them,' says he. 'Th true for ye,' says I, 'we have the shoul and our own kind o' throubles to carr them, and they make 'em ache someti but throubles are as different as people, what wouldn't be a featherweight to or me, might kill a delicate young creat and, may be, if her throubles were lai our backs, we'd never be able to straig up again.' But I'm kaping ye, Miss; name is Mary Callaghan, I'm poor rough, but I'm a dacent woman, ar there's ever anything that the loikes o' can do for the loikes o' you, all you've to do is to call and its proud I'll be to anything I can. You can trust us, fo are all honest people, if we are poor."

PSALMIST HISTORY.

THE Huguenots, before the battle of Coutras, knelt and chanted the one hundred and eighteenth Psalm, "Oh give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good; because his mercy endureth forever." Seeing their attitude of supplication, some courtiers said, "Behold, the cowards are already begging mercy!" "No," answered an old officer, who knew their way, "you may expect a stern fight from the men who sing psalms and pray."

The anecdote illustrates the part the Psalms have played in history, especially in the throes that accompanied the Reformation. The forty-sixth Psalm, "God is our refuge and strength," is the basis of Luther's battle-hymn of that great Revolution, "A strong tower is our God." The sixty-eighth, "Let God arise, let his enemies be scattered," was known among the Huguenots as the "Song of Battles." Savonarola chanted it as he marched to the most precious pyre ever lighted in Florence. After the victory of Dunbar, Cromwell and his army sang the one hundred and seventeenth Psalm, "O praise the Lord, all ye nations; praise him all ye people." No one knows what a great part the Psalms have played in the lives of men. These poems, which reflect every praiseworthy human emotion, have associated themselves, like the rain and the sunlight, with all sorts and conditions of men, women and children. The penitential groanings of the sixth Psalm, "O Lord, rebuke me not in thine anger," have been sobbed out by Catherine de Medici, John Calvin, and Mrs. Carlyle. It might be properly called the "Universal Psalm of the Penitent."

When the eloquent, erratic Edward Irving was dying, he gathered up his strength and chanted, in Hebrew, the twenty-third Psalm, the Shepherd's Song. "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil," whispered Scotland's greatest metaphysician, Sir William Hamilton, and then breathed out his spirit. The parting word of Luther, of Knox, of John Huss, of Jerome of Prague, and of countless martyrs and saints, was the fifth verse of the thirty-first Psalm: "Into Thine hand I commit my spirit." The northernmost grave on the face of the earth is Cape Beechey, on the brow of a hill covered with snow. In it is buried the body of a member of the Nares expedition. A large stone covers the dead, and on a copper tablet at the head is engraved a part of the seventh verse of the fifty-first Psalm: "Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow."

Never was "A Prayer of Moses, the man of God," the ninetieth Psalm, read amid more solemn circumstances than on the occasion of the burial of one of the victims of the accident upon the Matterhorn in 1865. Three English gentlemen and their Swiss guide lost their lives. The almost formless bodies of three of them were found on the glacier below the mountain, and on one, that of the Rev. Charles Hudson, was found his prayer-book. Taking it reverently in his hands, a clergyman, present with the searching party, read from it the ninetieth Psalm. Above them was the frowning mountain and the cloudless sky. Bronzed-faced guides and sorrowful friends leaned on their alpenstocks, while the minister read: "Lord, thou hast been our refuge from one generation to another. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever the earth and the world were made, thou art God from everlasting, and world without end. Thou turnest man to destruction; again thou sayest, Come again, ye children of men."

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

PHOTOGRAPHY IN WAR.

Prominent among the causes that have contributed to the success of Japan, in the present war with China, is the readiness with which the younger nation has adopted modern ideas and appliances in the field, as well as in the navy. One of these is the balloon photographer, whose services the Japanese generals have utilized to reconnoitre the position and strength of the enemy. Our illustration shows the aerial photographer at work, suspended from his captive balloon. His camera is so contrived that he can take a number of instantaneous views of the surrounding country, while he himself is practically out of danger. Up to the present time, Japan's record in the war has been an unbroken series of victories.

A JAPANESE WAR PHOTOGRAPHER.

RICHES UNSATISFACTORY.

The following incident is related of Jacob Ridgway, a wealthy citizen of Philadelphia, who died many years ago, leaving a fortune of $6,000,000. "Mr. Ridgway," said a young man with whom the millionaire was conversing, "You are more to be envied than any gentleman I know." "Why so?" responded Mr. Ridgeway. "I am not aware of any cause for which I should be particularly envied." "What sir!" exclaimed the young man in astonishment. "Why, are you not a millionaire? Think of the thousands your income brings you every month!" "Well, what of that," replied Mr. Ridgway. "All I get out of it is my victuals and clothes, and I can't eat more than one man's allowance, or wear more than one suit at a time. Pray, can't you do as much?" "Ah! but," said the youth, "think of the hundreds of fine houses you own and the rental they bring you?" "What better off am I for that?" replied the rich man. "I can only live in one house at a time; as for the money I receive for rents, why, I can't eat it, or wear it; I can only use it to buy more houses for other people to live in. They are beneficiaries, not I. I can only look at the furniture and pictures, and the poorest man who is not blind can do the same. I can tell you, young man, that the less we desire in this world the happier we shall be. All my wealth cannot buy back youth, cannot purchase exemtion from sickness and pain, cannot procure power to keep afar off the hour of death; and then, what will all avail when, in a few short years at most, I lie down in the grave and leave it all forever? You have no cause to envy me."

LIQUOR MADE THEM SAVAGES AGAIN

An uprising of the Kanakes on all the islands near New Guinea took place recently. The steamer, "Three Cheers" of Sydney, called at Admiralty Island and New Ireland and found the trading posts in ashes, and the trading schooner burned to the water's edge. On the steamer's approach the natives fled to the hills. The worst fears of the captain were realized. Traces of cannibalism of recent date were found without doubt; all the inhabitants had met with a terrible death, as victims are always tortured before being killed and eaten. Reports say that there were massacres on other islands. It is thought that the natives stole liquor at one of the trading posts and the effect upon them was to convert them into the wild state from which they had recently emerged.

BURNING THEIR IDOLS.

An Encouraging Incident in Missionary Work in China.

WRITING from Nangua, China, Miss Lizzie Fleming, a worker of the Church Missionary Society, relates this remarkable incident:

"Just very lately He has given me the great joy of seeing three families burn their idols. It was at a village called Gong-cueng, about seven miles from Nangua. We first got to know them by one of the wives coming down to our Women's Hospital. She asked us up to see them and stay a little while. Their story is very interesting. They were three brothers from another district, who came looking for work; strong, determined men who seemed to fear nothing. At first they stopped in the idol temple, but as they got richer they built two houses on the temple land, married wives, and took possession of the temple lands and mountains. The Gong-cueng villagers took them to law, but there is so very little justice in this land, it did not do much good. The magistrates said if the villagers would give them $200 for their houses they would have to go; but the villagers were very poor, good-for-nothing people, so could not do it, and they are still there, and as they have now seven sons, strong men like their fathers, the villagers are very much afraid of interfering with them. In China, when the sons marry, they bring home their wives to their father's house, and as they increase, they keep building. In this way large villages are formed. We often meet with large villages, and only one or two surnames in each.

"Some time ago, another sister missionary, a native Bible-woman and I went to the eldest brother's house, and God gave us a great victory; all in the eldest brother's house were converted.

"The other sister had to go back to Nangua, and at the end of the week, I said to the Bible-woman, we would have to go too; if they were not willing to believe in Christ, we must go elsewhere; but, in despair, I threw the whole over on the Lord, and he worked. That night, at prayers (we always had prayer at night, and they listened to us well), we told them we must go, if they would not have the true God, others would, and we must go and tell them. They said nothing, but early next morning the Bible-woman came to tell me in my room that the father was pulling down and putting the idols in a large pot and burning them. The poor wife was almost frightened to death; she kept running to me and asking, would God protect them—would Jesus keep them from evil spirits? I kept by her, and told her Jesus would protect them; he was greater than they, and idols could do her no good. The Bible-woman kept by the father and helped him to burn them all. After that we all knelt down and prayed, and after a little, when the poor old mother saw that nothing dreadful had happened, she was quite happy.

"Now, in place of those idols, they have the Ten Commandments and some texts, and the old father came down to the hospital and was cured of opium. They have prayer three times every day in their home, and they have promised after next year they will build a house on some land they have of their own, and buy more fields. I am praying God to make them give up the temple lands sooner. They say they cannot; but God could provide if they would only trust him.

"The other two families would not put away their idols at that time, they were so much afraid; but a little time ago one of the second brother's sons quarreled with her husband, and poisoned herself.

"They sent for us, saying were willing to worship the true God. The Bible-woman and I went up, but that night not one came to prayers, although I went over for them. I thought it strange; but I just left it with God. I knew they were dreadfully afraid of evil spirits, and afraid to put away their idols. Next day we got hold of the second brother, brought him in, and talked earnestly to him; and he said we must first worship in his house, and in the morning he would burn them. I cast the net and I reckoned on Jesus. Praise God, he won.

A TERRIBLE NIGHT OF PERIL.

Mr. J. H. Stafff a clerk on a touring trip through Ireland, had a remarkable escape from death at Howth. He descended by the grassy slopes which lie some distance downwards from the top of the cliffs, for the purpose of gathering wild flowers. He was thus engaged at a point between the nose of Howth and the Bailey lighthouse, when he accidentally missed his footing and went toppling downwards. When he awoke to consciousness, three hours afterwards (9 p. m.), Mr. Staff found himself resting on a platform about a foot wide lying between two ledges of rock, and on which some stones and herbage had accumulated. The intervening three hours were passed in merciful oblivion. His position was one calculated to make the stoutest heart quail. Above him the cliffs towered to a height of 200 feet, while the waves played 100 feet beneath him. Here he was, suspended between heaven and earth, with only an insecure resting-place intervening between him and almost certain death. He called for assistance, but in vain. As the night wore on he still continued to call at intervals, but still no answer came. Morning at length broke, and with it came rescue. About 7 o'clock two fishermen were engaged in hauling lobster-pots, when the cries from the cliff reached them. They saw the awful position of the man on his perilous perch. They rowed the boat to a point beneath him, and one of them attempted to climb to his assistance, but in vain. They then rowed to Howth for assistance, and ultimately a rescue party of coastguardsmen succeeded in removing the unfortunate man from his perilous position. No sooner had they done so than the platform of rocks came crashing to the foot of the cliff. Many a man, on becoming conscious of his sinful state, has seen the awful gulf of eternal death yawning before him, but God's Lifeboat has come to the rescue, and he has been saved through faith in Christ.

Perils in Far Thibet.

Mr. Grenard's Adventures during his Attempt to Explore the "Sealed Country" near Chinese Turkestan.

UP to the present time, despite the efforts of missionaries and explorers, Thibet remains almost a "sealed country" to the civilized world. The "China Mail" lately published an interesting account of the attempt of M. Grenard, a noted French explorer, to penetrate Thibet. His expedition was made under the auspices of the French Government for the purpose of securing geographical, astronomical and other information concerning Thibet. M. de Rhins, a naval officer and scientist, was the leader of the expedition, which began its journey between the Caucasus and Russian Turkestan in the early part of 1891.

In 1893, M. de Rhins and M. Grenard essayed to reach Thibet by the mountains, but they were unsuccessful as the road was too bad to permit of their crossing. The country is quite unknown, without tracks of any kind, barren, and affording not the least food for animals. They went back to Turkestan. When winter had ended in the third year, the explorers went out and succeeded in crossing the mountains by another route. Three months were spent in these mountains, and the party managed to penetrate within three or four days' journey of Lhassa. At this point a Chinese Imperial Commissioner, whose residence was at Lhassa, was encountered, accompanied by two high Thibetan officials and some high Llamas. For about fifty days the travelers remained there, receiving everything necessary for the continuation of the journey to Shening from the Chinese Commissioner and the Llamas.

"As long as we were on Thibetan territory," said M. Grenard, "we were very well received and travelled without difficulty, but when we came among the wild Thibetan tribes between Thibet proper and Shenning we had a very bad reception, generally speaking, especially from the Llamas. When we reached the Upper Yangtze we were attacked by robbers and M. de Rhins was killed on June 5th. We resisted, but our ammunition became exhausted, and as the men with us did not know how to properly use their firearms our efforts were vain. The Thibetans came upon me and the Russian soldier who was with me, and took away my arms and such things as my watch. About fifteen miles distant I found assistance from a llamassarie and by the influence of the chief of the monastery it was arranged that all the stolen baggage should be collected and sealed up, but I learned it could not be restored on the spot. After twenty-five days of vain expostulation, I proceeded to Shening by a road which has never been seen by any European before. It is in the territory of the famous Golos brigands. We succeeded in crossing without meeting any brigands and reached Shening safe and sound in July of last year. In Shening I had a very kind reception from the Chinese authorities, and from the High Commissioner. Subsequently I went down to Lanchow, where I was again very well received by another officer who despatched a body of troops to the scene of M. de Rhins' murder, to arrest the culprits and take them to Peking.

"We travelled through countries quite unknown to even the surrounding natives. We have seen places neither Europeans nor Asiatics have ever been to, and for months have been in regions where not even a track exists. Our escort was twelve men. On the first trip we had two Russians, and on the second trip but one Russian; the other men were Turks. We had horses and camels to carry our baggage. The highest altitude attained by us in the mountains was 20,000 feet above the sea. There is no doubt that the Llamas do all they can to keep the country a sealed book. They themselves remain shut up in their monasteries, and will have nothing to do with strangers."

THE GOSPEL IN JAPAN.

Rev. J. W. Wadman, Missionary at Tokyo, Japan, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows:—"Your kind letter of Jan. 11th reached here this morning with a check for $20, in aid of the work among the Japanese under my care. I long to thank you with all my heart and to assure you that it will be assiduously applied for the furtherance of the blessed Gospel among these multitudes who do not know God. The war has created opportunities for the distribution of God's Word among the soldiers. Permission has been given us by headquarters to visit all barracks and garrisons and, with the assistance of the officers in charge, to distribute the Scriptures among the inmates and also to preach to the soldiers. This is a glorious opportunity and much good is being done. Not content with this, we have applied for and obtained permission to send Chaplains to the armies now in China and already two efficients workers have gone. God is in in this good work, and the masses of the people are being stirred. Yesterday nine bright young students of the Higher School came to me and entreated to be taught the Holy Bible twice a week. They belong to the best families and are promising candidates for our work. While I now write a postal card comes to hand from Brother Loomis, Secretary of the Bible Society, which intimates that he distributed 20,000 copies of the Gospel and testaments last week, and sent 5,000 more to be freely distributed in Nagoya and Hiroshima among the soldiers. 'I am now,' so he says, 'on my way to to Sendai and Yokosuka, naval and military stations, to preach in the barracks, visit the sick in the hospitals, and distribute the word of God. Glory be to God!' Oh, pray for us! What responsibilities await us! How urgent the need for Holy Ghost equipment and power!"

THE DROUGHT.

Up and down, throughout our land,
We heard the piteous cry
From out the stricken drought-belt sent:
"Oh, help! or we must die."

Two years our crops have failed entire,
Corn or wheat was grown;
The hot wind's scorching breath was felt,
Before our grass was mown.

Day after day we watched for rain
With eager, earnest eyes;
But still the hot winds scorched our land,
And cloudless were the skies.

The weary days passed, one by one
In slow and full of pain;
Not a ray of hope was left,
So late would come the rain.

Our crops were ruined; what have we
To feed our little ones?
The winter's wind is hard to bear
With no fire in our homes.

O brothers, sisters, In His Name
Who hears the raven's cry,
We send you this appeal for aid,
And will you him deny?

For in his Word he says, that e'en
A cup of water given,
In his dear name, to one in need,
Remembered is in heaven.

The story went forth, and soon was heard
From north, south, east and west;
Each wish to organize for work,
And do the very best.

And many homes have been relieved
From hunger and of cold;
And many fainting hearts have found
The loving Saviour's fold.

God bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and
Its readers far and near;
And in his work may they be found
More earnest every year.

ANNE DOWE

THE CELESTIAL RAILWAY."

Soon after taking my seat in a railway car writes a well-known English pastor, the conductor came in and punched my ticket, marked me with his eye, and passed on. As he was again passing I said: "Conductor, I'm a conductor." "You a conductor?" he interrogated. "Yes, on the Celestial Railway. Have you a through ticket?" "I fear not," he replied. "You better get one, or you will get put off the train before you get into the city." "May I ask you a question?" he continued. "Yes." "Do you ever pray?" "Yes." "Does your wife hear you?" "Yes." "I'll tell you," he said. "I've started recently, but am quiet way. I have'nt joined the church yet, even baptized, and don't think I will be." "Sir," I replied, "that is the order of the General Superintendent of the Celestial Railway, and you can't expect favors on this line unless you obey orders. Have to obey orders or quit the road." "I guess that's so," he said thoughtfully, and added, "but it's a long, hard struggle." "So it seemed to me once," I replied, "but I have learned better. It is a matter of perfect confidence; at that point the struggle ends. It's all up-grade till we get there."

And I was so glad to be able to tell him that I struck down-grade, the struggle was over, and the way bright and beautiful. There was a call for a station, and as he turned to leave, as though new light had come to him, with a smile he said, "I think you're right."

YOUTH'S OPPORTUNITES.

"Let no man despise thy youth," wrote Paul to Timothy. Perhaps some cynic will add were Paul living to-day he had better write, "Let no man despise thy gray hairs." Certain it is that in all departments of thought and activity young men are being brought to the front. This is a glorious era for young men. However, this is not the only age in which young men have achieved great things.

History is not without precedent in this respect. Alexander the Great had conquered the world as known in his day, by the time that he was thirty years of age. Calvin wrote his "Institutes" before he was twenty-seven. Chatterton, the English poet wrote "Elinoure and Iuga" in his fourth year. Bryant composed "Thanatopsis" when only nineteen years of age. Somerfield at twenty-three was one of the first pulpit orators of America. Napoleon at thirty-seven was crowned as emperor of France. Lafayette was intrusted by the Continental Congress with the defense of Virginia when twenty-three. David and Solomon were both called to occupy the throne of Israel while as yet they were young men. Joseph was prime minister of Egypt while still a young man. The Son of God only lived among men for the short space of thirty-three years. The young man of to-day has much to encourage him in the history of the past and the thrilling possibilities for the future. New avenues of usefulness and success are daily opening before him. How terrible to see young men selling their birthright, debasing their powers, and wasting their energies. How fearful to have among us that which enslaves and destroys them.

A NEW TESTAMENT'S TRAVELS.

Many years ago a little girl asked her parents to give her two New Testament as a New Year's gift. "One," she said, is for myself and the other is for the heathen. She was given the two volumes and in one of them she wrote: "A little girl who loves the Lord Jesus wishes with all her heart that whoever reads this should also love and believe on him." This New Testament went to India, and found its way to a station in the interior.

A Hindoo lady obtained it. She could read, but was unable to write; and as she longed to be able to write, her attention was immediately drawn to the inscription on the fly leaf.

The large and distinct characters of the child's handwriting attracted her so much that she tried to imitate them again and again. Gradually the sense of the words made an impression upon her, and the question arose, "May not these words have been written just for me?" She began then earnesely to read the New Testament; her eyes were osened, and she learned to know and love her Saviour.

Years passed. The little girl had meanwhile grown up, and thought no more of the New Testament which she had sent once upon a time to the heathen. But her love for missions had grown up with her, and it was her deepest desire to serve the Lord among the heathen. She was accepted as a missionary, and sent to a rather out of the way station in India. There she entered one day the house of a Hindoo Christian lady. In the course of conversation the Hindoo lady showed her visitor a book, a New Testament, and told how she, a Hindoo heathen, had been by its means brought to Jesus her Saviour.

Imagine the joyful astonishment of the lady missionary when she recognized in the book the same New Testament on whose fly leaf she had many years ago, as a little girl, written those words which had served to show the poor Hindoo lady the way to Jesus.

Together they knelt down, praised God's wonderful ways, and thanked him who had drawn them both to himself.

Last year we commenced an elaborate plan of advertising, but before we were half through, OUR ADVERTISEMENTS DISAPPEARED. Why? Because WE WERE OVERWHELMED WITH BUSINESS. There was but one thing to do: withdraw the advertising and devote every energy to filling the orders with which we were flooded. This we did, and handled with reasonable promptness a constantly increasing year's business.

WITH ENLARGED FACTORIES, INCREASED FACILITIES, AND TWENTY BRANCH HOUSES FROM WHICH TO DISTRIBUTE OUR GOODS, WE CAN NOW CARE FOR ALL WHO COME. Last year we could not reduce prices because we were compelled in some way to limit the demand for Aermotor goods. We would have been satisfied with lower prices, but why create a demand which we could not supply? We have made the heaviest purchases of steel and material bought in America this year, and at unprecedented prices, and have made terms to dealers which enable them to make unprecedented prices.

In quality, character, variety, finish, and accessibility to full stock of goods and repairs, we are without competitors. In our plan of advertising last year, we proposed to furnish a feed cutter under certain conditions for $15. For reasons stated above we did not complete the advertising, and the feed cutter was not put out. We now propose to make amends in the following manner: We will commence in this paper our NEW ALL-STEEL VERY SUPERIOR FEED CUTTER, WORTH cash with order, f. o. b. Chicago. Only one to one person, he to furnish addresses of ten neighbors who ought to have something in our line. Cut, description and full information regarding it will appear soon.

We especially desire to caution you against paying excessive prices for windmill outfits. The temptation on the part of the dealer to overcharge is great. $10 added to the legitimate price is $30 clear profit to the dealer. To be sure that you get the proper price and save yourself from being overcharged, write us of your needs and you will be protected. We are, and always have been believers in low prices. Because of the prodigious output of our factories we are enabled to have special tools for each piece, and thus reduce the hand labor on it to merely picking up the material and laying it down again. So small has become the cost of labor put on the material which we sell that it is not worth mentioning. We have become the largest dealers in the material, of course, be- ing made up in the form of steel galvanized-after-com- pletion windmills, towers (tilting and fixed), tanks, pumps, etc. To such an extent has this become true, and to such an extent has the price of our goods (and volume of our business rendered competition impossible), that FOUR LARGE WINDMILL CONCERNS ARE BUYING THEIR TOWERS OF US THIS YEAR. THEY DO IT BECAUSE WE MAKE THE ONLY ABSOLUTELY RELIABLE AND SAFE TOWER; BECAUSE THEY CAN BUY OF US CHEAPER THAN THEY CAN BUILD; AND BECAUSE WE ALONE ARE PREPARED TO GALVANIZE EVERYTHING AFTER IT IS COMPLETED, AND COMPLETE EVERYTHING EXACTLY RIGHT.

These concerns are wise, for, even though they may not furnish the best of wheels, the wheel will have the best of supports. Send to us your name and address, and those of your neighbors who may need something in our line, and thereby do them a good turn. The Aermotor Co. is one of the most successful business enterprises which has been launched in recent times. In succeeding advertisements will be discussed and made clear the lines on which that success has been worked out. It was done by a farmer's boy. A careful following of these advertisements may suggest to some other farmer's boy a career.

Japan Seeking the Light.

She Consents that the Gospel of Christ be Preached to her Soldiers and Sailors—A Glorious Concession by a once Heathen Nation.

FROM Rev. H. Loomis, a missionary of Yokohama, and an occasional correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we have received the following most interesting letter, explanatory of the recent concession by Japan to the Christian missionaries and teachers, permitting them to labor among the soldiers and sailors of the island empire.

"On arriving at Hiroshima it was evident that an attempt ought to be made at once to supply with the Scriptures, the thousands of soldiers who were quartered in the garrison and other parts of the city, many of whom must be reached soon, if ever, with the Gospel. And so, on Sunday, finding great numbers walking about the streets I took a basket filled with copies of one of the Gospels and rode about giving them to all the soldiers whom I met. With but few exceptions they were received with evident pleasure and interest. Many expressed sincere thanks and some of them

Told me they were Christians.

In this way more than a thousand portions were distributed. The work was continued in the same way for three days, and the result was, that with some help from others more than four thousand portions of the Bible were thus placed in the hands of the soldiers at a most opportune time to secure their interest and do them good. It was especially fortunate that the work was begun on the Sabbath as on Monday night several thousand left for the seat of war. The most remarkable event of the trip was the result of a visit to a man who is one of the Assistant Secretaries to the Cabinet and an earnest Christian. On hearing of the work already done he expressed his hearty approval and volunteered to send to the men and officers in the navy whatever donations of the Scriptures might be made. He promised to forward them by one of the supply vessels to a Christian officer and this officer would distribute them to all the ships in the fleet. We have sent two thousand Gospels and fifty New Testaments to be distributed in this way.

On Board the Flag Ship

"Upon application, permission was given me to visit the hospitals at Nagoya, Osaka, and Hiroshima, where the sick and wounded Chinese are kept. Copies of the Chinese Scriptures were supplied to such as could read, and they were received with evident pleasure. I have since been to the Red Cross Hospital at Tokyo where there were about thirty Chinese. At my request Dr. McCartee accompanied me; and as he had spent some thirty years in China, he was able to converse with many of them in their own language. Opportunity was given to explain the object of our visit, and also tell them something about Christianity. The men listened with the deepest interest, and received with expressions of gratitude the books that were given. Three of the number were Mohammedans, but they were apparently quite as of one of the Gospels as any of the rest. In all cases the same care and attention is given to these prisoners as is bestowed upon their own people. I was told by the chief surgeon at the military hospital that artificial limbs are to be supplied by the Empress to both the Chinese and Japanese soldiers alike.

"I have since visited the Buddhist Temple in Tokyo in which there are 179 Chinese prisoners who are not sick or wounded. We were permitted to give them copies of the Scriptures, and Dr. McCartee talked to them in the same way as at the hospital. At first the men were somewhat indifferent, but as they came to understand just what we were doing they were most eager to receive the books.

"Having found the Vice Commander of the Tokyo Division very friendly to my work among the prisoners I ventured to ask if permission could be obtained to distribute Scriptures among the Japanese soldiers also. He answered very promptly, 'I have the authority, and willingly grant such permission among these who belong to this Division.' Then he proposed as there were 1,000 wounded and sick men in the hospitals, who had nothing to occupy their minds that they should be supplied first. Some two or three days later I called upon the same man again and obtained information as to the location of the soldiers in this department and the number of men in each place. On visiting the different quarters I found that I was expected and there was everywhere

A Pleasant and Cordial Reception.

At one of the barracks the men were arranged in a semicircle and I was invited to address them before the distribution took place.

"When I asked for the same privileges among the soldiers of the Imperial Guard I was informed that it would not only be given but that Commander-in-chief, Prince Komatsu (who is a cousin of the Emperor and head of the army), had designated an hour when he would receive me at the palace. I was met by Col. Sameshima, Chief of Staff, and presented to the Prince. He received me kindly and expressed approval and thanks for the work the Bible Societies are doing. Finding so much favor I then went to the War Department and requested from Gen. Kodama, the Vice Minister of War, a permit to and supply the men with copies of the Gospels. This was at once granted. Letters have been furnished to the commanding officers of each division instructing them to give me such assistance as I should require. I have also been provided with such a list of the location of the soldiers, and the numbers in each place, as will enable me to do the work readily and efficiently,

"Four chaplains have been selected and (under official sanction), will be sent to China to teach Christianity to the soldiers. Some of the officers have been making investigations into the character and conduct of the Christians, and the result has been so favorable that it is decided that the teaching of Christianity should be encouraged. On the 23d inst. a regiment of 1,200 men at Nagoya was drawn up in line, and after an address about the Bible and Christianity, each of the men was supplied with a copy of one of the Gospels. Arrangements have been made to supply a second regiment of 1,400 men on the coming Sabbath in the same way.

"The War Department has intimated that there is no objection on the part of the Government to Christian teaching; and it is simply left to the local commanders to decide whether it may be done or not. Thus far have been distributed. On the 1st of February 20,000 more are to be completed for the supply of the Imperial Guard. 40,000 more are to be ready by the 10th of February; and in the course of about a month more we hope to be able to place a copy of some portion of the Scriptures in the hands of every sailor and soldier in Japan, and a considerable portion of those now in China. From this time on hundreds and thousands of the young men of Japan will no longer be restrained from the study of God's Word by military or other restrictions, and permission will be to them the evidence that the religion of Jesus Christ is approved by the highest authorities in the land."

About 30,000 Gospels and Testaments

THE WAY OF THE CROSS.

IN a far away land on a stone it is written,
Chiseled in characters fair to the sight,
In the place where he labored, loved and was smitten,
"The way of the Cross is the way of light."

Beautiful words! forever out-sending
The story of Christ and his wonderful might,
Telling of love to the lowest and bending,
"The way of the Cross is the way of light."

Beautiful truth, on my life be thy shining!
Sun of my day and star of my night;
So shall I walk unmoved, unrepining,
"The way of the Cross is the way of light."

FINISHING THY WORK.

FINISH thy work; the time is short;
The sun is in the West:
The night is coming down—till then
Think not of rest.

Finish thy work; then wipe thy brow;
Ungird thee from thy toil;
Take breath, and from each weary limb
Shake off the soil.

Finish thy work; then go in peace;
Life's battle fought and won,
Hear from the throne the Master's voice:
"Well done! Well done!"

Finish thy work; then take thy harp,
Give praise to God above;
Sing a new song of mighty joy
And endless love

Give thanks to him who holds thee up
In all thy paths below;
Who made thee faithful unto death,
And crowns thee now.

HUDSON TAYLOR IN CHINA.

spite of the disturbed condition of the Chinese Empire, Rev J Hudson Taylor is continuing his work there and is personally superintending the operations of the China Inland Mission To an English publication he has sent the following letter:

fter the war commenced I took a second journey in Northern China. It was quite uncertain when I left Tien-tsin to go inland, whether it would be possible to return to that port. The journey, however, was safely accomplished, and I reached Shanghai early in December, after an absence of ten weeks.

was thankful to find in all the stations visited that the war had given rise to no unfriendly feelings, and that there was good evidence that the government was taking steps to protect and promote the kindly feelings towards the missionaries. I was greatly cheered by the progress of the Gospel in several stations which I had not visited before, especially in those opened by Mr Studd and Mr Stanley Smith.

Your readers will have heard of the presentation of a beautiful copy of the New Testament to the Empress Dowager on her sixtieth birthday. This so interested the Emperor that he sent to the depot to purchase a copy, and also the Old Testament. The copy sent proved to be defective, and was returned for a more perfect one, showing that the Emperor had at least taken the interest in it of turning over the leaves and examining the book. That the Word of God should come into the hands of these royal personages at this time is a very significant fact, and should lead to much prayer at in their trouble they may be led to look to the living God for help.

eel there should also be much prayer that the dynasty may be upheld. It is undoubtedly that our missionaries have been protected, and able to live in peace in nearly every province of the empire. The overthrow of the dynasty would, moreover, lead to deplorable results, and it is a question whether any new dynasty could govern China better; for if many of the present officials are corrupt, their removal might make room for worse, and a revolution could not be effected without results fearful to contemplate. Some of us have been led up to pray more than ever that God would bless the reigning family, and guide the councils of the nation so that peace may soon be restored.

Within the last few days intelligence has reached us of the landing of a number of Japanese troops at Ninghai, one of our stations, about fifteen miles from Chegro. Mr Omalin, who in Mr. Judd's absences has been superintending the work of this station, is at present in Shanghai, having come here at my request for conference on some matters of business. So far we have only telegraphic tidings, as being winter, communication with the North is largely suspended. We are praying for the native Christians, as also for those in Manchuria, who are known to have suffered much through the war. They are more exposed at this time than the foreign missionaries, whom it is the interest of all to safeguard.

Whatever may come, the Lord reigns, and all power is given unto Him. Engaged in His work, remaining in posts of duty at His command, we have his sure promise, "I will never leave you." So that we may boldly say, "The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me."

am thankful that reinforcements have been coming out as usual, and that both the training-homes, for men and women, remain an undisturbed part of the country, far from the seat of war. The need of additional workers is still very great.

CHRISTIAN PROGRESS IN INDIA.

Fifty years ago the number of native Christians did not exceed eighty thousand; there are now about six hundred and twenty thousand—an increase of nearly eightfold. But the work done is not to be measured merely by the number of converts. Hindu public opinion is being Christianized. The Eastern Aryans are beginning to claim the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man as doctrines of their own. Dewan Ragunatha Rau has shown to his own satisfaction that a good part of the shorter Catechism, so highly valued in Scotland, is contained in the sacred books of the Hindus written many centuries in advance of its compilation. Public worship was unknown among the Hindus until introduced by Ram Mohun Roy, who borrowed it from Christian missionaries. The latest movement of this kind has been the establishment of a Hindu Young Men's Association.

ONE LITTLE GIRL'S PRAYER.

Child-faith in the prevailing power of Christian prayer was never more beautifully illustrated than in an incident which occurred at a religious meeting in London not long ago. A timid little girl in the audience wanted to be prayed for; she wished to come to Jesus, but was exceedingly diffident, and so she said to the gentleman conducting the meeting: "Will you pray for me in the meeting, please—but do not mention my name." In the meeting which followed, when every head was bowed, and there was silence, the gentleman prayed for the little girl who wanted to come to Jesus, and he said: "O Lord, there is a little girl who does not want her name to be known, but thou dost know her; save her precious soul!" There was a perfect silence, and away in the back of the meeting a little girl arose, and in a little voice said: "Please, it's me, Jesus; it's me!" She did not want to have a doubt. She meant it. She wanted to be saved, and she was not ashamed to rise in that meeting, little girl that she was, and say, "Jesus, it's me!" When the audience heard her simple, yet sufficient, acknowledgment, there was hardly a dry eye in the hall. It was an incident that touched the heart.

THE RUSSIAN STUNDISTS.

At a recent meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, Dr. Baedeker described his missionary tour in Russia, from which he has just returned. Speaking of the Stundists generally, Dr. Baedeker said they were not one sect but were of various sects. Some are Baptists; others hold the same views as the Friends; all are loyal subjects of the Emperor, and only desire to be allowed to obey the Word of God. Formerly many of them were formally tried and judged before being banished; now they are often sent away without any preliminary examination. If the Emperor could only be moved to examine personally the state of affairs, a change for the better would be hoped for, but with the numberless claims on his time and attention it may be a long time before he gives the matter any consideration. Dr. Baedeker asked that very earnest and continuous prayer should be made on behalf of these persecuted and worthy people. If anything can be done by way of interposing on their behalf it ought to be done quickly.

A SWEET DISPOSITION.

"If you wish to do honor to your piety," says Fenelon, "you should render it sweet and simple, affable and social." It is certain that a sociable, open-hearted, unpretentious, and sweet-spirited religion is most to be desired in these days of show and glitter, pretense, and pride emptiness and formality, hatred and bitterness. This cold, wicked world needs melting down.

THE RICHEST OFFERING.

IT is not the deed we do
Though the deed be never so fair,
But the love, that the dear Lord looketh for,
Hidden with lowly care
In the heart of the deed so fair.

The love is the priceless thing,
The treasure our coffers must hold,
Or ever the Lord will take the gift,
Or tell the worth of the gold
By the love that cannot be told.

Behold us, the rich and the poor,
Dear Lord, in Thy service draw near.
One consecrateth a precious coin,
One droppeth only a tear:
Look, Master, the love is here!

—CHRISTINA G. ROSETTI.

"THE RIVER OF JOSEPH."

There are bits of Egyptian scenery not far from Cairo which are unknown to the tourist. He crosses, on his way up the Nile, the intake of a large canal, the Bahr Jesuf. He seldom realizes that the water course, partly artificial and partly natural, bears the name of the Patriarch Joseph, and is ascribed, by tradition at least as old as the tenth century, to the son of Jacob. It is an interesting attempt to trace, even in imagination, the direction of this stream. Passing between the fertility which produces and the desert of unconquerable sterility, it traverses the Libyan Hills, and yields up its waters to innumerable canals in the semi-oasis of the Fayoum.

Some miles distant, in the desert, stands a lonely temple whose antiquity is unknown, but which some archæologists believe to be as old as the Sphinx, and older, therefore, than the Premiership of Joseph. It is 300 feet above the lake. It was first mentioned by Mr. Cope Whitehouse in 1882, and is of special interest, because it seems to prove that the Birket el-Qerun, now covering about eighty square miles, filled, at the time of Herddotus, the whole of this vast depression; so that the temple stood at the water's edge.

This was the theory of Mr. Cope Whitehouse, which led him also to examine the desert to the south, where he discovered the Raiyan depression, which, may be converted into a vast reservoir, covering two hundred and fifty miles, to replenish the canals of Egypt at the season of low Nile.

COME, LORD JESUS.

LORD, our longing hearts grow weary,
Waiting for our soul's loved choice;
Every hour seems sad and dreary,
Till we hear Thy welcome voice:
Come, Lord Jesus!
Come and bid our hearts rejoice.

Thou hast promised Thou wouldst take us
To Thy everlasting home:
Greater still, that Thou wouldst make us
Sit with Thee upon Thy throne.
Come, Lord Jesus!
Come and claim us as Thine own.

Blessed Lord, behold Thy promise,
See, we hang upon Thy word;
Thou has spoken, 'I come quickly;'
Thou has spoken, we have heard.
Come, Lord Jesus!
Come, our own, our faithful Lord."

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Springs 1 and 2.—For Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, Uric Acid Diathesis, Gout, Rheumatism, Nervous Prostration, &c.

Dr. William A. Hammond, of Washington, D. C., Surgeon-General U. S. Army (retired), Professor of Diseases of the Mind and Nervous System in the University of New York, etc., referring to Spring No. 2:

"I have for some time made use of BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in cases of affections of the Nervous System, complicated with Bright's Disease of the Kidneys or with a Gouty Diathesis. The results have been eminently satisfactory. Lithia has for many years been a favorite with me in like cases, but the Buffalo Water certainly acts better than any extemporaneous solution of the Lithia Salts, and is, moreover, better borne by the stomach."

Dr. John H. Tucker, of Henderson, N. C., President of the Medical Society of North Carolina, Member of the American Medical Association, referring to Spring No. 1, says:

"I have obtained BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in Gout, Rheumatism, excellent results from Uric Acid Diathesis, especially for pale, feeble, and anæmic subjects—indeed for patients of this class, my experience teaches, that the Water of Spring No. 1 is more efficient than that of No. 2, and for such conditions I have no hesitancy in saying that it is a remedy of great potency."

Wm. O. Baskerville, M. D., Oxford, N. C., referring to Spring No. 1, writes:

"BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 1, is a powerful tonic to the Nervous System as well as to the blood. I have known it to produce magical effects in Nervous Prostration, resulting from overwork, prolonged mental strain, etc., and convalescents from adynamic diseases have been restored to health in a surprisingly short time, the water being a direct blood producer, a valuable heart tonic and a physiological diuretic."

This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

VOLUME 18. COPYRIGHT 1895 BY LOUIS KLOPSCH. NUMBER 14.

REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D., Editor. Offices, Bible House, New York. NEW YORK, APRIL 3, 1895. PRICE, 5 CENTS. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

The Gospel to the "Outsiders."

The Object of Dr. Talmage's New Metropolitan Pulpit—He breaks the Bread of Life to over 50,000 Hungry Souls since the Beginning of the Present Year—A Free Pastorate, Free Seats, and a Free and Full Salvation offered to All.

N every large city in the United States, there is a non-church-going element of considerable proportions. Especially is this true of New York, in whose cosmopolitan sea the tides of many races and nationalities mingle, and which, in addition to its own proper population of nearly two millions, has at all seasons of the year a large floating population, brought hither by pleasure or business or from other causes, who make the metropolis a place of temporary sojourn. This great body of transients may be naturally classed as an addition to the rank of the non-church-goers.

To estimate with any degree of accuracy the numerical strength of that part of New York's population, resident and transient, who acknowledge allegiance to no recognized religious organization, would be a difficult matter; but a careful census would show it to number far up into the hundreds of thousands, if indeed it does not represent an absolute majority of the whole. It is this element, also, which comprises all sorts and conditions of "men" and women, although in the sense that it represents every shade of religious belief, as well as every grade in social life and intellectual culture, from the ignorant to the æsthetic, and from the tenement dweller to the millionaire. Just what has kept very many of them from uniting in church fellowship and sharing the privileges of Gospel teachings with others, need not here be discussed; it is sufficient to know, beyond all peradventure, that such a condition really exists, and that in the metropolis of our nation—with all its Christian philanthropies and the zeal of its churchmen—there is an unnumbered host of souls who, by their own choice or by force of circumstances, are practically inaccessible to the Gospel teachings of the regular churches.

It is now many months since the importance of reaching this element with the Gospel invitation became deeply impressed upon the mind of Dr. Talmage. Friends with whom he discussed the matter strongly urged him to follow his convictions and undertake the task of carrying to this great body of outsiders the message of free salvation. Yielding to repeated solicitations, he set aside all other engagements and resolved to devote his efforts thenceforward to this singular ministry. Through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Academy of Music, in Fourteenth Street, New York, was secured, and on the first Sabbath afternoon of the present year, was held the first of a most remarkable series of Divine Services, which have gone on uninterruptedly ever since. Vast multitudes, far beyond the capacity of any public hall in New York to accommodate, assembled every Sunday, blocking the sidewalk of Fourteenth Street and Irving Place, although it was patent to everybody that not half the number could hope to gain admission. Every seat in the great triple-galleried building, the auditorium, the boxes, and even the aisles and corridors, were packed with eager and attentive audiences. Five thousand within and thousands more without, every Sunday, demonstrated the intense interest of the non-church-goers and their warm approval of the spiritual effort in their behalf. No sooner are the doors of the Academy opened at 3:30 P.M., than the great building is filled to overflowing. Although all doors are then closed, the outside crowds continue to increase, and this goes on week after week. On no single Sunday has it been possible to keep the doors open till 4 o'clock, the hour at which the services are announced to begin.

And so, Sunday after Sunday, they have flocked thither, and listened attentively to the Word, drinking in eagerly the truths that fall from the lips of a preacher whose ministry finds its chief strength and potency in the fact that he believes, above all else, in the presentation of those grand old Gospel truths that come with healing and with blessing to the hearts of sinful men. Indeed, the sole attraction in these services is the plain, old-fashioned, simple Gospel; for there is neither band nor choir, nor organ, nor any other theatric or meretricious accessory employed. The congregational singing of the sweet, old-fashioned Gospel Hymns is led by Prof. H. EvreBrowne (formerly organist of Dr. Talmage's church in Brooklyn) upon the piano, and Prof. Alion the cornet, and these are drowned in the swelling volume of sound that comes from thousands of throats—a volume of praise that can be heard far beyond the Academy walls, and which is frequently taken up and prolonged by the crowds outside.

THE GOSPEL SHIP.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached last Sunday in the Academy of Music, N.Y.

Text: Gen. 6: 8: "Thou shalt come into the ark, thou and thy sons and thy wife and thy sons' wives with thee."

IN this day of the steamships "Lucania, and "Majestic," and the "Paris," I will show you a ship that in some respects eclipsed them all, and which sailed out, an ocean underneath, and another ocean falling upon it. Infidel scientists ask us to believe that in the formation of the earth there have been a half-dozen deluges, and yet they are not willing to believe the Bible story of one deluge.

In what way the catastrophe came, we know not: whether by the stroke of a comet, or by flashes of lightning, changing the air into water, or by a stroke of the hand of God, like the stroke of the axe between the horns of the ox, the earth staggered. To meet the catastrophe, God ordered a great ship built. It was to be without prow, for it was to sail to no shore. It was to be without helm, for no human hand should guide it. It was a vast structure, probably as large as two or three modern steamers. It was the "Great Eastern" of olden time.

The ship is done. The door is open. The lizards crawl in. The cattle walk in. The grasshoppers hop in. The birds fly in. The invitation goes forth to Noah: "Come thou and all thy house into the ark." Just one human family embark on the strange voyage, and I hear the door slam shut. A great storm sweeps along the hills, and bends the cedars until all the branches snap in the gale. There is a moan in the wind like unto the moan of a dying world. The blackness of the heavens is shattered by the flare of the lightnings, that look down into the waters, and throw a ghastliness on the face of the mountains. How strange it looks! How suffocating the air seems! The big drops of rain begin to plash upon the upturned faces of those who are watching the tempest. Crash! go the rocks in convulsion. Boom! go the bursting heavens. The inhabitants of the earth, instead of flying to house-top and mountain-top, as men have fancied, sit down in dumb, white horror to die. For when God grinds mountains to pieces, and lets the ocean slip its cable, there is no place for men to fly to. See the ark pitch and tumble in the surf; while from its windows the passengers look out upon the shipwreck of a race, and the carcasses of a dead world. Woe to the mountains! Woe to the sea!

I am no alarmist. When, on the twentieth of September, after the wind has for three days been blowing from the northeast, you prophesy that the equinoctial storm is coming, you simply state a fact not to be disputed. Neither am I an alarmist when I say that a storm is coming, compared with which Noah's deluge was but an April shower; and that it is wisest and safest for you and for me to get safely housed for eternity. The invitation that went forth to Noah sounds in our ears: "Come thou and all thy house into the ark."

Well, how did Noah and his family come into the ark? Did they climb in at the window, or come down the roof? No; they went through the door. And just so, if you get into the ark of God's mercy, it will be through Christ the door. The entrance to the ark of old must have been a very large entrance. We know that it was, from the fact that there were monster animals in the earlier ages; and, in order to get them into the ark, two and two, according to the Bible statement, the door must have been very wide and very high. So the door into the mercy of God is a large door. We go in, not two and two, but by hundreds, by thousands, by millions. Yea, all the nations of the earth may go in, ten millions abreast.

The door of the ancient ark was in the side. So now it is through the side of Christ—the pierced side, the wide-open side, the heart side—that we enter. Aha! the Roman soldier, thrusting his spear into the Saviour's side, expected only to let the blood out, but he opened the way to let all the world in. Oh what a broad Gospel to preach! If a man is about to give an entertainment, he issues two or three hundred invitations, carefully put up and directed to the particular persons whom he wishes to entertain. But God our Father makes a banquet, and goes out to the front door of heaven, and stretches out his hands over land and sea, and, with a voice that penetrates the Hindoo jungle, and the Greenland ice-castle, and Brazilian grove, and English factory, and American home, cries out, "Come! for all things are now ready!" It is a wide door! The old Cross has been taken apart, and its two pieces are stood up for the door-posts, so far apart that all the world can come in. Kings scatter treasures on days of great rejoicing. So Christ, our King, comes and scatters the jewels of heaven. Rowland Hill said that he hoped to get into heaven through the crevices of the door. But he was not obliged thus to go in. After having preached the Gospel in Surrey Chapel, going up toward heaven, the gate-keeper cried, "Lift up your heads, ye everlasting gates, and let this man come in!" The dying thief went in. Richard Baxter and Robert Newton went it. Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America may yet go through this wide door without crowding. Ho! every one—all conditions, all ranks, all people! Luther said that this truth was worth carrying on one's knees from Rome to Jerusalem; but I think it worth carrying all around the globe, and all around the heavens, that "God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Whosoever will, let him come through the large door. Archimedes wanted a fulcrum on which to place his lever, and then he said that he could move the world. Calvary is the fulcrum, and the Cross of Christ is the lever; and by that power all nations shall yet be lifted.

Further: It is a door that swings both ways. I do not know whether the door of the ancient ark was lifted, or rolled on hinges; but this door of Christ opens both ways. It swings out toward all our woes; it swings in toward the raptures of heaven. It swings in to let us in; it swings out to let our ministering ones come out. All are one in Christ—Christians on earth and saints in heaven.

> One army of the Living God
> At his command we bow:
> Part of the host have crossed the flood,
> And part are crossing now.

Swing in, O blessed door! until all the earth shall go in and live. Swing out until all the heavens come forth to celebrate the victory.

But, further, it is a door with fastenings. The Bible says of Noah, "The Lord shut him in." A vessel without bulwarks or doors would not be a safe vessel to go in. When Noah and his family heard the fastening of the door of the ark, they were very glad. Unless those doors were fastened, the first heavy surge of the sea would have whelmed them; and they might as well have perished outside the ark as inside the ark. "The Lord shut him in." Oh, the perfect safety of the ark! The surf of the sea and the lightnings of the sky may be twisted into a garland of snow and fire—deep to deep, storm to storm, darkness to darkness; but once in the ark, all is well. "God shut him in."

There comes upon the good man a deluge of financial trouble. He had his thousands to lend; now he cannot borrow a dollar. He once owned a store in New York, and had branch houses in Boston, Philadelphia, and New Orleans. He owned four horses, and employed a man to keep the dust off his coach, phaeton, carriage and curricle: now he has hard work to get shoes in which to walk. The great deep of commercial disaster was broken up, and fore-and-aft, and across the hurricane-deck, the waves struck him. But he was safely sheltered from the storm. "The Lord shut him in!" A flood of domestic troubles fell on him." Sickness and bereavement came. The rain pelted, the winds blew. The heavens are aflame. All the gardens of earthly delight are washed away. The mountains of joy are buried fifteen cubits deep. But standing by the empty crib, and in the desolated nursery, and in the doleful hall, once a-ring with merry voices, now silent forever, he cried: "The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." "The Lord shut him in." All the sins of a lifetime clamored for his overthrow. The broken vows, the dishonored Sabbaths, the outrageous profanities, the misdemeanors of twenty years, reached up their hands to the door of the ark to pull him out. The boundless ocean of his sin surrounded his soul, howling like a simoom, raving like an euroclydon. But, looking out of the window, he saw his sins sink like lead into the depths of the sea. The dove of heaven brought an olive-branch to the ark. The wrath of the billow only pushed him toward heaven. "The Lord shut him in!"

The same door-fastenings that kept Noah in keep the troubles out. I am glad to know that when a man reaches heaven all earthly troubles are done with him. Here he may have had it hard to get bread for his family; there he will never hunger any more. Here he may have wept bitterly: there "the Lamb that is in the midst of the throne will lead him to living fountains of water, and God will wipe away all tears from his eyes." Here he may have hard work to get a house; but in my Father's house are many mansions, and rent-day never comes. Here there are death-beds, and coffins, and graves; there no sickness, no weary watching, no choking cough, no consuming fever, no chattering chill, no tolling bell, no grave. The sorrows of life shall come up and knock at the door, but no admittance. The perplexities of life shall come up and knock on the door, but no admittance. Safe forever! All the agony of earth in one wave dashing against the bulwarks of the ship of celestial light shall not break them down. Howl on, ye winds, and rage, ye seas! The Lord—"the Lord shut him in!"

Oh, what a grand old door! so wide, so easily swung both ways, and with such sure fastenings. No burglar's key can pick that lock. No swarthy arm of hell can shove back that bolt. I rejoice that I do not ask you to come aboard a crazy craft with leaking hulk, and broken helm, and unfastened door; but an ark fifty cubits wide, and three hundred cubits long, and a door so large that the round earth, without grazing the post, might be bow in!

Now, if the ark of Christ is so gran place in which to live, and die, and trium come into the ark. Know well that the d that shut Noah in shut others out; though, when the pitiless storm came ing on their heads, they beat upon the d saying, "Let me in! let me in!" the d did not open. They expe to come in; but the antediluvians said, must cultivate these fields; we must worth more flocks of sheep and herds cattle; we will wait until we get a little er; we will enjoy our old farm a little lo er." But meanwhile the storm was br ing. The fountains of heaven were fill up. The pry was being placed beneath foundations of the great deep. The year had come, the last month, the week, the last day, the last hour, the moment. In an awful dash, an ocean d ped from the sky, and another rolled from beneath; and God rolled the e and sky into one wave of universal struction.

So men now put off going into the They say they will wait twenty years They will have a little longer time with worldly associates. They will wait they get older. I have no doubt that derision kept people out of the ark. The world la to see a man go in, and said, "Her a man starting for the ark. Why, ther be no deluge. If there is one, that ble ship will not weather it. Aha! into the ark! Well, that is too go keep. Here, fellows, have you hear the news? This man is going into the Under this artillery of scorn the man's resolution perished.

And so there are hundreds kept o by the fear of derision. The young ma himself, 'What would they say store to-morrow morning if I should b a Christian? When I go down to the house they will shout, 'Here come new Christian. Suppose you will no anything to do with us now. Suppo are praying now. Get down on your and let us hear you pray. Come, give us a touch. Will not do it, eh? Christian you are!'" Is it not the being laughed at that keeps you out kingdom of God? Which of these ers will help you at the last? Wh lie down on a dying pillow, which of them will be there? In the day of eternit they bail you out?

My friends and neighbors, come i away. Come in through Christ, th door—the door that swings out towar Come in, and be saved. Come and h py. "The Spirit and the Bride say, C Room in the ark! Room in the ark

But do not come alone. The text invites you to bring your family. It says, "Thou and thy sons and thy wife." You cannot drive them in. If Noah had tried to drive the pigeons and the doves into the ark, he would only have scattered them. Some parents are not wise about these things. They make iron rules about Sabbaths, and try force the catechism down the throat, as they would hold the child's nose and force down a dose of rhubarb and calomel. You cannot drive your children into the ark. You can draw your children to Christ, but you cannot coerce them. The Cross was lifted, not to drive, but to draw. "If I be lifted up, I will draw all men unto me." As the sun draws up the drops of morning dew, so the Sun of Righteousness exhales the tears of repentance.

Be sure that you bring your husband and wife with you. How would Noah have felt when he heard the rain pattering on the roof of the ark, he knew that his wife was beside in the storm? No; she went with him. And yet some of you are on the ship "outward-bound" for heaven; but your companion is unsheltered. You remember the day when the marriage-ring was set. Nothing has yet been able to break it. Sickness came, and the finger shrank, but the ring staid on. The twain stood alone above the child's grave, and the dark mouth of the tomb swallowed up a thousand hopes; but the ring dropped not into the open grave. Days of poverty came, and the hand did many a hard day's work; but the rubbing of the work against the ring only made it shine brighter. Shall that ring ever be lost? Will the iron clang of the sepulchre-gate unlock it forever? I pray God that you who have been married on earth may be together in heaven. Oh! by the quiet bliss of your earthly home; by the babe's cradle; by all the vows of that day when you started life together, I beg you to see to it that you both get into the ark.

Come in, and bring your wife or your husband with you—not by fretting about religion, or ding-donging them about religion, but by a consistent life, and by a compelling prayer that shall bring the throne of God down into your room. Go home and take up the Bible and read it together, and then kneel down and commend your souls to him who has watched you all these years; and, before you rise, there will be a flutering of wings over your head, angels sing to angel, "Behold! they pray!"

But this does not include all your family. Bring the children too. God bless the dear children! What would our homes be without them? We may have done much for them. They have done more for us. What salve for a wounded heart there is in the soft palm of a child's hand! Did harp or flute ever have such music as there is in a child's "good-night?" From our coarse, rough life, the angels of God are often driven back; but who comes into the nursery without feeling that angels are hovering around? They who die in infancy go straight into glory, but you are expecting your children to grow up in this world. Is not a question, then, that rings through all the corridors, and windings, and heights, and depths of your soul, what is to become of your sons and daughters for time and for eternity? "Oh!" you say, "I mean to see that they have good manners." Very well. "I mean to dress them well, if I have myself to go shabby." Very good. "I shall give them an education, I shall leave them a fortune." Very well. But is that all? Don't you mean to take them into the ark? Don't you know that the storm is coming, and that out of Christ there is no safety? no pardon? no hope? no heaven?

How to get them in? Go in yourself! If Noah had staid out, do you not suppose that his sons—Shem, Ham and Japheth—would have staid out? Your sons and daughters will be apt to do just as you do. Reject Christ yourself, and the probability is that your children will reject him.

An account was taken of the religious condition of families in a certain district. In the families of pious parents, two-thirds of the children were Christians. In the families where the parents were ungodly, only one-twelfth of the children were Christians. Which way will you take your children? Out into the deluge, or into the ark? Have you ever made one earnest prayer for their immortal souls? What will you say in the judgment, when God asks, "Where is George, or Henry, or Frank, or Mary, or Anna? Where are those precious souls whose interests I committed into your hands?"

Oh, ye who have taught your children how to live, have you also taught them how to die? Life here is not so important as the great hereafter. It is not so much the few furlongs this side of the grave as it is the unending leagues beyond. O, eternity! eternity! Thy locks white with the ages! Thy voice announcing stupendous destiny! Thy arms reaching across all the past and all the future! O, eternity! eternity!

In St. Paul's, London, there is a whispering-gallery. A voice uttered most feebly at one side of the gallery is heard distinctly at the opposite side, a great distance off. So, every word of earnest prayer goes all around the earth, and makes heaven a whispering-gallery. Go into the ark—not to sit down, but to stand in the door, and call until all the family come in. Aged Noah, where is Japheth? David, where is Absalom? Hannah, where is Samuel?

On one of the lake steamers there was a father and two daughters journeying. They seemed extremely poor. A benevolent gentleman stepped up to the poor man to proffer some form of relief, and said, "You seem to be very poor, sir." "Poor, sir," replied the man, "if there's a poorer man than me a-troublin' the world, God pity both of us!" "I will take one of your children, and adopt it, if you say so. I think it would be a great relief to you." "A what?" said the poor man. "A relief! Would it be a relief to have the hands chopped off from the body? or the heart torn from the breast? A relief, indeed! God be good to us! What do you mean, sir?" However many children we have, we have none to give up. Which of our families can we afford to spare out of heaven? Will it be the oldest? Will it be the youngest? Will it be that one that was sick some time ago? Will it be the husband? Will it be the wife? No! No! We must have them all in. Let us take the children's hands, and start now. Leave not one behind! Come, father! Come, mother! Come, son! Come daughter! Come, brother! Come, sister! Only one step, and we are in. Christ, the door, swings out to admit us; and it is not the hoarseness of a stormy blast that you hear, but the voice of a loving and patient God that addresses you, saying, "Come thou and all thy house into the ark." And there may the Lord shut us in!

has preached eleven sermons in the Academy, all of which have appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the week subsequent to delivery. Fifty thousand people have heard these sermons or quite as many have been turned away; but millions more have read the sermons afterward, for his audience is world-wide. It is due to him to state that he has absolutely declined to accept any compensation for these services, regarding the great work upon which he has entered as one calling for special consecration and sacrifice. With the exception of a few reserved chairs, every seat in the Academy is absolutely free, and the expenses of conducting the services are defrayed by voluntary contributions.

Strangers from all parts of the world form a considerable part of the audiences; indeed, it seems as if every nation on the face of the earth were represented there every Sunday. At the conclusion of the services and after the benediction has been pronounced, there is usually a good, old-fashioned handshaking between the preacher and the strangers among his flock. Frequently so many have remained to enjoy this familiar and kindly greeting, that Dr. Talmage has been kept busy shaking hands for over an hour. But he accepts this display of hearty cordiality as a privilege, rather than an infliction. His heart and soul are in the work. Already abundant evidences of spiritual results have become manifest and, under Divine blessing, these Sunday services at the Academy of Music are constantly growing more and more precious to very many who, till now, have been "outsiders" and aliens from the Gospel fold.

BIBLE FIELDS IN ABYSSINIA.

It is claimed by a German writer that the Abyssinians are among the oldest Christian peoples in existence, who have retained their national independence. To them Christian scholarship has been indebted not only for a valuable and ancient version of the Bible, but also for such works as the Book of Enoch, the Book of Jubilees, the Ascension of Isaiah and similar specimens of earliest Christian or Judæo-Christian literature, which had been lost to the rest of Christianity. Now new treasures are to be brought from this hermit nation of Eastern Africa. The present king, Menelik II., has recently undertaken an expedition south of Shoa to the islands of the Znai Sea, which are some of the oldest civilized spots in Abyssinia, and has brought from them a large collection of old manuscripts, which he proposes to put into the library of his new capital, Addis Abeba. Tradition says that during the Mohammedan inroads into Abyssinia in the sixteenth century, the libraries of the Abyssinian kings were transferred to these islands, especially on the island Debra Simon, or Mount Sinai.

Africa's Slave Mart.

Mozambique's Early History — Present Development Under Portuguese Rule.

SINCE a determined effort to suppress the slave trade in Africa was inaugurated some fifteen years ago, Mozambique has been a centre of interest to the whole civilized world. It lies on the eastern coast of the Dark Continent and includes the adjacent island bearing the same name. It extends from Lake Nyassa on the west to the coast and has the River Zambesi for its southern, and the River Rovuma for its northern boundaries. It is now four hundred years since it fell into the hands of the Portuguese. At that time the island was occupied by the Arabs who made it a place of call for traders from India who exchanged the products of that land for gold, ivory and amber which the Arabs collected from the interior of Africa. The adjacent mainland was in the possession of the Bantus, the big burly negroes who had, a few years before, driven out the yellow Bushmen and Hottentots who originally occupied it. The Arabs, too, had retreated before them and confined themselves to the island, where they were protected from the Bantus by the stormy strait which it was not safe for the Bantus to cross in their canoes. Vasco da Gama established Portuguese rule on the island and built a fortress there. The Portuguese, however, were in continual difficulties in the region, being assailed by the Bantus, the Arabs, and by the Turks who made attacks on them from Egypt. They were disappointed, too, in their hopes of finding gold mines near the coast, but in 1645 a new trade began, the profit of which was as large as the trade was horrible. It was the trade in slaves.

The Portuguese made the island of Mozambique a penal settlement and sent the worst type of its convicts there. Interest in the island waned and things were allowed to take their own course until Livingstone's explorations awakened all Europe to the value of Africa. Then began the struggle for "spheres of influence," which has continued to the present time. Portugal realized the advantage of her ancient possession of Mozambique, reasserted her claim, and set to work to civilize the island after her own fashion and demanded possession of the territory opposite the island on the mainland. In the recent rearrangement of spheres, the Portuguese western boundary has been fixed on the eastern shore of Lake Nyassa and a line running from the shore to the Zambesi. West of that line is British territory, and it is there that the fiercest part of the struggle to put an end to the slave trade has taken place. The way to Mozambique from the interior was through the territory now in British hands, and in passing through it with their convoys of slaves the Arabs have been liable to attack by British forces. The Portuguese hoped to have avoided this interference, by securing possession of a belt of land clear across the continent to Angola, but British missionaries had established themselves in the Shire country and the Makololo chiefs being driven to choose between Great Britain and Portugal, so decidedly preferred the former, that Portugal realized that it would be prudent to abandon its claim and content itself with Nyassa as the western boundary of its possessions. It has of late made considerable progress in the development both of the island and the territory on the mainland, as the buildings shown in the accompanying illustration indicate.

The colony thus far has not been profitable to the Portuguese. Large sums have been spent in building, but the trade has drifted into the hands of citizens of other nations and the efforts made to develop the coffee and other industries have failed through the heavy taxes levied on products. The religious work is in the hands of the Roman Catholics and has made very little progress among the natives. Prior to the middle of the eighteenth century, Jesuit missionaries had made some efforts to educate and civilize the people, but at that time they were expelled from Portuguese East Africa, and as Protestant missionaries are not welcomed, dense ignorance prevails.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

S. S. Lesson for April 14. 1. Cor. 15: 3-14. Golden Text 1.Cor. 15:20. By Mrs. Baxter.

"IF in this life only we have hoped in Christ, we are of all men most pitiable." (1. Cor. 15: 19, R.V.) Such is Paul's conclusion in speaking of the resurrection. What would it avail us to receive the pardon of our sins, and to turn from sin, the world, and the flesh, if we had nothing better to look to than that which the world and the flesh which we had renounced, can give us? If the end of all our earthly life were the grave, and the dead were not raised, then "let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." (1. Cor. 15: 32.) Let us seek our pleasures in time if we are to have no eternity; let us look for honors here, if the future is only death, decay and darkness. It is contrary to all human reason to suffer loss, dishonor, pain, if no result shall come of it. "But," he adds, "Now is Christ risen from the dead,"—the guarantee of resurrection for all the children of men—"the First-fruits of them that slept," since "he being risen from the dead dieth no more, death hath no more dominion over him." (Rom. 6: 9.)

Under the law, temporal blessings, in the city and in the field, in the family and in the farm stock, in the store, in traveling and in war, and moreover, "in all that thou puttest thine hand unto" (Deut. 28: 2, 8), were promised to them that should obey God's commandments. Under the Gospel we have as a reward for obedience. On the contrary, our Lord leads us to expect tribulation (John 16: 33), persecution (Matt. 5: 10–12), hatred, (Matt. 10: 22), and teaches us to glory in these things so painful to the flesh, while he ever places before us the future "resurrection of the just" (Luke 14: 14; 22: 35, 36; 21: 36; Matt. 19: 28, 29), as the bright, sure goal in the future. Thus when Paul writes of the resurrection, he not only says, "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures," but also that "he was buried and raised on the third day according to the Scriptures." (R.V.) And he dwells upon the many times in which, and the many persons by whom Christ was seen alive after he was risen. Paul lived what he preached, his own great aim and desire was to know "the power of his resurrection." The first preachers of the Gospel set forth the resurrection of Jesus as their one greatest proof that he was the Messiah (Acts 2: 22–32; 3: 15–26; 4: 10–33; 5: 30), and Paul well knew that the power of Christ's resurrection upon the life of one of his disciples was as great as the power of his death.

Crucified with Christ, having died with Christ, having taken, by our own consent, and by faith in him, the place of the executed criminal, we "put off the old man with his deeds." But it is only as being also "risen with Christ through faith in the operation of God who raised him from the dead," that we have the power to "walk in newness of life," and to "seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God." "If we have been planted together in the likeness of his death," buried with him as the plant is buried in the earth, it is that we may share his life, and have our existence in his. "Because I live, ye shall live also." This is

The Power of His Resurrection.

Not by efforts, plans determinations of our own, but by the oneness with him which is his own "operation," we are lifted into an- [illegible] . And as we walk in newness of life, this life of being raised with him becomes a deeper reality to us; we are, so to speak, more at home in it. The fact of Christ's resurrection is our strong and glorious basis for our new life. He was raised for our justification; being raised, he "ever liveth to make intercession for us." It is God's seal to the Gospel and to our faith. "If Christ hath not been raised, then is our preaching vain," says Paul, "and your faith also is vain, yea, and we are found false witnesses of God, because we witnessed of God that he raised up Christ; whom he raised not up if so be that the dead are not raised. For if the dead are not raised, neither hath Christ been raised; and if Christ hath not been raised, your faith is vain, and ye are yet in your sins. Then also they which have fallen asleep in Christ have perished." So tremendous are the issues at stake in the resurrection of our Lord.

But are we really and truly practical believers in the resurrection of Christ, and do we know the power of his resurrection in our lives? Is the world to which we are going so real to us that it influences all our inner and outer life in this present world? If not, is not the resurrection of Christ a mere doctrine or historical fact to us, and is it not a lie to say that we are risen with Christ? Christ's resurrection was so real to Paul that he reckoned the sufferings of this present time (which in his life transcended incalculably those of most men, "not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us.") Paul saw before him in the future the manifestation or unveiling of the sons of God, which the creation is earnestly waiting for. He saw that it meant deliverance from the bondage of corruption—from all which speaks of sickness, decay, and death, "the redemption of the body," when the last enemy, death, shall be overcome. In close connection with this he saw and in all things which are permitted to happen, working together to conform them that love God to the image of his Son. To Paul the resurrection of Christ and the resurrection of the just meant all this. Have we ever dwelt upon what Scripture tells us of the resurrection? By man came death, by man also resurrection; in Adam all die, in Christ shall all be made alive. And yet there is order and distinction and the first fruits. He is already risen. Next in order, "they that are Christ's at his coming," surely there are they that wait for him unto salvation. Then, and not till those are taken away, cometh the end. But other questions arise, Christians differ so much—one from another; some live so near the world that it is difficult to discover whether they are Christians at all; others carry Christ so about with them that it would be impossible to ask the question which their very presence answers. Will they all be when they rise? The Word tells us that as the seed sown in the ground must die as a bare grain, and then in its resurrection "God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him," and not the body which was sown, and again, that each different seed rises into life in "a body of its own (R. V.), differing from that which results from other seed—so also is the resurrection of the dead." Again, "there are celestial bodies and bodies terrestial, but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestial is another." Yes, indeed, the celestial gives light to the terrestial. The sun, moon, and stars differ in their glory, and one star differs from another, "so also is the resurrection of the dead."

Are we treading on ground too holy for us when we look into that last given Scripture, the book of the unveiling of Jesus Christ, for farther light? There, in the midst of the throne, and round about the throne, we see four living creatures, sharing the very throne of him who shares the very throne of the Father (Rev. 4: 6) giving the keynote of heaven's praises; standing closest to the Lamb, leading and regulating the worship of heaven, sharing judgment with the Lamb, yet never mentioned after the marriage of the Lamb—do not these signify the highest of these grades of risen and glorified ones, perhaps even the Bride of the Lamb? Are those not the most glorious of the "celestial bodies," which, with him, the Son of Righteousness, give light to the terrestial? "There is" another glory of the four and twenty elders, "around," but never in the midst of "the throne;" next to the living creatures, as the living creatures are next to the Lamb, ministering to the Apostle John, and always connected with the "living creatures." May not these, connected with and dwelling in the glory of the throne, be also the symbol of these "celestial bodies," yet not of equal glory?

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

"THEY FOUND THE STONE ROLLED AWAY."

WHEN Paul, preaching at Athens, spoke of the resurrection of the dead, his hearers mocked. There are people now who mock at that doctrine, and unhappily, their mockery does harm. It tends to produce in the minds of those who give heed to it, a disposition of the most deplorable kind. When anyone doubts the existence of a life beyond the grave, he is apt to use the words that the great Apostle quotes, with the scorn he must have often felt as he heard them: "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." The idea that death ends all, that all we are is laid in the grave when we die, to decay and turn to dust, inevitably begets the idea that we are merely the highest kind of animals, whose happiness must be sought in animal pleasure. Scarcely a child in the Sunday School will grow to manhood or womanhood without being tempted to entertain that idea, and it will be fostered every time he looks upon the face of the dead and realizes that never more will those eyes gleam with intelligence, or those lips speak a word. The child may be saved from the benumbing, degrading notion, if on this Easter day, when we celebrate our Lord's resurrection, his teacher can implant in his mind the conviction which Paul labors to express in the verses of the lesson.

Analyzing Paul's argument, we conclude that he had found two kinds of opponents, and these two exist to this day. One kind held that man had no soul, and therefore no existence apart from the body. Therefore, when the body died, there was an end of the man. The other kind believed in the existence of a soul, but thought that at death it was absorbed into the source of life, as a raindrop falls into the sea. Paul denied both theories and propounded his own. He proclaimed Christ as the life-giver. He bases his argument on Christ's own resurrection. It all turns upon that. If Christ did not rise, Paul's argument, his preaching, his sufferings, his life were in vain. If Christ was merely a man, and died as other men, and did not rise from the dead, Paul is willing to abandon his position, and declare that he is of all men the most miserable. He is, therefore, careful to establish his fact at the outset. He mentions several persons by name who saw Jesus alive after he had died and been laid in the tomb. Besides these, there were five hundred, many of them still living, who had also seen him, and, still more to the purpose, Paul declared that he had seen him himself, referring, it may be presumed, to the vision he had at his conversion, outside the gate of Damascus. There was no question as to Christ's death; if he did not die when they thought he did, but merely swooned on the cross, the spear of the soldier would have killed him. He was surely dead; therefore, when afterwards he was seen alive, there was but one description of him that could be true, and that the only that Christ himself used, "I am he that liveth and was dead."

From this fact Paul deduces several conclusions. These are: First, that Christ was divine, which of course involves his teaching being true, his revelation being authentic, and his promises being trustworthy. Second, that he who rose from the dead, could and would raise his people from the dead. Third, that the resurrection would be one in which the identity and individuality would be continued. Fourth, that men so raised would not be in a vague, vaporous condition, but would be provided with suitable bodies resembling the bodies laid in the grave, as the wheat resembles the seed from which it springs, but superior to them, inasmuch as they would never decay; bodies like the glorious body in which Jesus ascended to heaven. And, incidentally, the comfort of those who expected to be alive at his return, that they, too, would have these bodies, by a miraculous change. He concludes his argument with a burst of triumph, declaring that these conclusions remove the sting from death, as they show that it need no longer be dreaded, Christ having overcome it and transformed it into the gateway of a fuller and better life.

No resurrection of the dead. Nothing in the world of plants looks more dead than the annual which botanists call, "Anastatica Hierochuntina." It is a desert plant which contracts itself into a ball and is blown about by the breeze, like a dead and withered mass of dry twigs. But plunge it into water, and it expands, gains the bloom of life and becomes a thing of beauty. On the desert sands it is dead, but under new conditions it becomes alive. No one knows what resources God has at his command, therefore a man is very rash who contends that there can be no resurrection.

Risen from the dead. "After a long absence in Australia," says Henry Varley, "I visited a town in the North of England where I labored some years before. I wished to see several persons who had worked with me and whom I respected highly. One meets many people who pass out of one's life though not out of one's memory. It is always so with people who travel around a great deal and have little time for correspondence. I went to one well-remembered house where lived a good man who was an enthusiastic worker. Many an hour of prayer I had spent with him in that house before we walked together to the place of meeting. I could point out the window of the very room in which we used to kneel and wrestle for the blessing. But what is this? The house is vacant and a big bill announces that it is "to let." Was my old friend dead? The thought gave me a shock. I went to the agent who had the renting of the house and asked sadly if Mr. W—— was dead. 'I see,' I added by way of explanation, 'that his house is to let.' The agent looked up smilingly and said, 'Oh, no, he is not dead, he has moved to a better house on the hill in a better situation.' So I found it was and I went to see him. Not long afterwards I stood by the coffin of an aged saint and looked down on that vacant face, the words came back to my mind and I said to myself, 'Oh, no, not dead, but moved to a better house on the hill in a better situation!'"

If Christ be not risen. The hope of everlasting life turns upon the Christian's unity with Christ. The close union—Christ in him—is the foundation of his life. There is one kind of caterpillar that undergoes the change of his being into a butterfly, in a leaf instead of a cocoon. In the Fall the caterpillar chooses a large leaf on a tree, carefully picking one without a hole in it. He draws the edges together and wraps them over, weaving a light web around the whole. It is coned-shaped and he can rest inside with comfort. But he knows that the winds will blow and the leaf may be blown off the tree, so he strengthens the natural stem by winding a cord of many fine strands around it and over and around the twig on which it grows. Then he goes into his chrysalis state in security. How firmly the leaf is attached can be seen on many a tree. After all the winter's storms which have stripped every leaf off, those leaves remain which the caterpillars secured. The Christian who dies trusting Christ may go down to the grave with the same confidence that the caterpillar trusts himself in his leaf. His faith unites him to Christ with a bond that can never be broken and in that union is life.

A BEACON LIGHT TO THE LOST.

How the Bowery Mission Reaches Down to the Lowest Depths and Rescues the Poor, Degraded Human Wrecks—The Outcasts Reclaimed.

THE HOT-AIR CRADLE AS USED IN MISSION WORK

THERE is no depth of human misery and degradation so low that it cannot be reached by the love of Christ. In the carrying out of his work, those of his servants who are faithful do not hesitate at personal sacrifice, peril or discomfort. In every city of large population there are many men who, having gone down step by step in the paths of sin, have at last reached a deep beyond which it would seem impossible to go. They are the moral shipwrecks who have been swallowed up in the maelstrom on whose edge they dallied, until hopelessly engulfed. At last, turned and forsaken, they are cast up like wreckage upon the outer coasts of society, to be turned from with loathing by their fellowmen, as something too utterly vile for recognition. They have reaped wellnigh the full harvest of their sins, and it would seem that nothing remained but a wretched close to a career so miserable and forlorn.

Many of these poor, stranded wrecks have, by God's mercy, been cast up at the doors of the Bowery Mission. Rejected elsewhere, they have there found a haven of welcome. Their poor clothing and filthy condition have been the cause of other doors being shut in their faces; but, even in mission work, it is customary to draw the line at those who have fallen so low as to make their very touch contamination. But the Bowery Mission, like a life-boat on its merciful errand, plunges down into the lowest depths, if by doing so it may bring up some poor, sinking fellow-mortal into the light of God's love. Are they sick and penniless? It cares for them as tenderly as though they were brothers. Ragged? It is never without a garment for those who need one to shut out the piercing winds of winter. Are they foul and verminous? It sends them to a place where they are thoroughly cleansed, and where their clothing is put in a wire "cradle" enclosed in a cylindrical hot air chamber and subjected to a temperature that effectually destroys the cause of discomfort, and prepares the wearers to enjoy the almost-forgotten luxury of clean, wholesome quarters at the Mission. Are they idle and despairing? It aids them in finding employment. Are they sin-sick and sore, weary of the hard battle of life? It leads them to the foot of the Cross where they can lay down their burden of guilt and begin the new and better life.

Such, in brief, has been the work of the Bowery Mission during the past fifteen years of its existence. Now that it has passed into new hands, this work will be prosecuted with redoubled vigor and on broader lines than before. The doors have not been closed a single night in fourteen years. Half a million men, mainly wrecks, drawn from all grades of life and representing many nationalities, have heard the Gospel there—very many of them to their eternal advantage, for 60,000 have been led to Christ within these walls. A record has been kept of the spiritual results of the mission work that would fill many pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Nearly twenty metropolitan churches have co-operated warmly, and many of the pastors have themselves spoken from the mission chapel platform, while others have been represented there by the active evangelistic element in their own churches. Among the churches that have thus aided are the Park Avenue Presbyterian, University Place Presbyterian, Twenty-ninth Street Collegiate Church (Dutch Reform), St. Bartholomew's (Protestant Episcopal), Scotch Presbyterian, Fourteenth Street Presbyterian, Grace Church (Protestant Episcopal), and others. The Y. M. C. A., New York Association for the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor, and Charity Organization Society have also co-operated. Christian business men, merchants and philanthropists, and a number of Christian ladies have demonstrated their love of the work by visiting the Mission, and sharing in its labors as well as contributing towards its resources. These good friends will continue to stand by the Mission in its broader field, and with its new conductors, as they have done in the past.

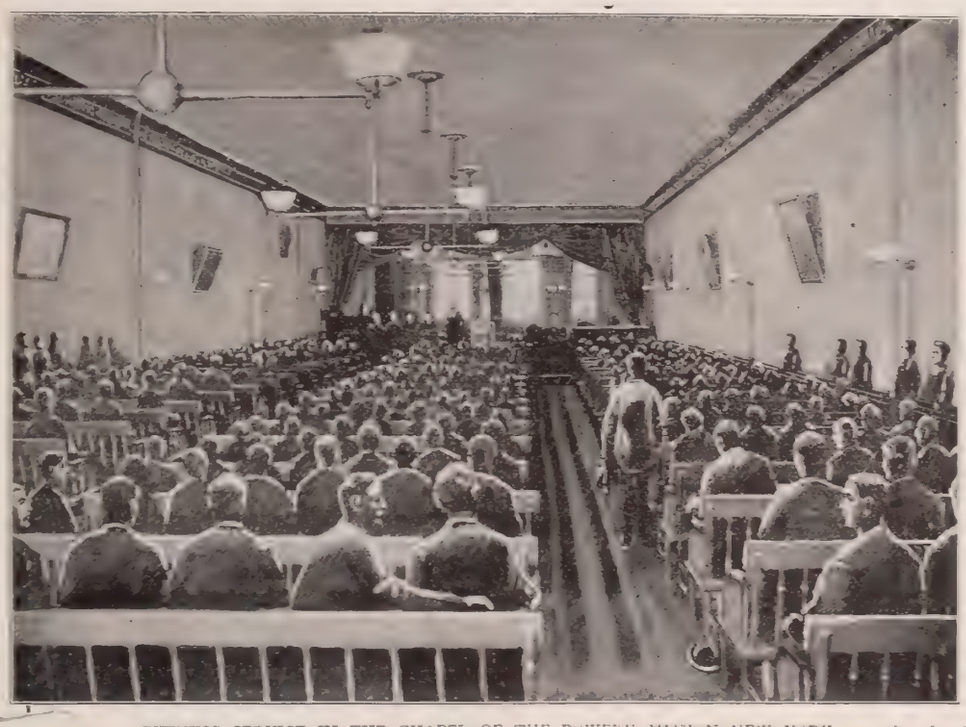
As was intimated in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the care of the Bowery Mission was assumed by the proprietor of this journal on April 1. The work of renovating the Mission was at once begun and of increasing its facilities to accommodate the steadily growing attendance. As the people who come to the Gospel meetings are usually penniless, there is of course, no collection taken up; hence, with the exception of money received from those who can pay for their beds, there is no income. It was found desirable to add fifty more beds to the dormitories, thus affording a capacity of accommodating 200 persons.

Ever since the death of the late Superintendent the converts at the mission have labored zealously and successfully to maintain its spiritual efficiency, and for many weeks past the spiritual work has been steadily growing. At the evening meetings the general attendance averages 300, and although the audience is largely changed every night, there are usually from twenty-five to fifty converts present. Hardly a week passes in which there are not a number of notable conversions. Two of these will possess an interest for our readers:

A poor, broken, wretch with whom the world had gone all wrong, and whose hope had given way to despair, decided to kill himself. He secured a pistol and was on his way to the docks, intending to make a sure end of himself by shooting and then jumping into the river. As he tottered down the Bowery, deaf to almost everything, he passed the open doors of the Mission and a strain of music fell upon his ears. He stopped a moment, listened, and without thinking what he did, went in. Presently, the clouded brain comprehended what was going on; he became interested, and after listening still further and being conversed with kindly, put his suicidal purpose aside. He would think it over a bit, he concluded. Again and again he came to the Mission, and at last his heart melted and was filled with the love of the Saviour, and he found peace in believing. He is now filling a position of responsibity and trust, and is literally "a new man" in Christ Jesus.

One night there came to the Mission a man who had led a hard life. He had served in nine State prisons, for the greater part of thirty years. As he related his experience at the Mission it chained the attention of his audience, and excited their deepest sympathies. "The last time I was in prison," he said, "was in Sing Sing. When I came away the keeper said to me: 'We'll keep your cell here for you for two weeks. We expect to see you back in that time.' I came away and I went to a place in New York where they furnish crooks with clothes on credit, and they get paid back out of the first job of crooked work that is done. I happened to be going by the Bowery Mission soon after that and I just strolled in. The result has been that I have become a Christian, and, please God, I'm done with crime forever, and hope never to see Sing Sing again." His hope is being realized, for he is now engaged in mission work and helping to bring others to the same Saviour who brought him triumphantly "out of the depths."

Those of our readers who desire to be placed on the list of the patrons of the Bowery Mission, and to be identified with its spiritual work, are invited to send their names to Dr. Klopsch, who will communicate with all who write on this subject.



EVENING SERVICE IN THE CHAPEL OF THE BOWERY MISSION NEW YORK

A Phenomenal Pastorate.

Fifty-five Years' Unbroken Service for Christ in the same Congregation.

IN the death of Rev. James Brownlee, D.D., which occurred at Crawford, N. J., Feb. 21st, there passed away a man whose character and history call for special mention. It seldom happens that a minister is permitted to serve the same congregation for more than half a century, but such was the happy lot of Dr. Brownlee, who became pastor of the Reformed Church, at Port Richmond, Staten Island, August 23d, 1835, and continued in that office until his work on earth was finished.

THE LATE REV. JAMES BROWNLEE, D.D.

For fifty-five years he remained in active service and then owing to the infirmities of age he retired, leaving the church under the charge of Rev. A. H. Demarest, who had been for a few years associated with him in the ministry. It was his custom, however, to the last to preach the sermon at the Communion seasons, and only three weeks before his death his congregation were privileged to listen to him, although at the time he was feeble and scarcely able to complete the service.

Dr. Brownlee was born at Falkirk, Scotland, in the year 1808. His father, who was a clergyman of the Presbyterian Church, was stricken with paralysis in his pulpit at Falkirk on the Sabbath Day and died shortly after, and the impression this event made upon the son led him to study for the ministry. He was educated at Glasgow University and was ordained as a minister of the Gospel after coming to this country and at the time of his installation as pastor of the church on Staten Island. Thus his entire ministerial life was spent with the people to whom he came nearly sixty years ago, in the vigor of early manhood. Those who were children when he came among them are now bowed down with the weight of years.

Dr. Brownlee was a faithful preacher of the Word and the church prospered under his care. Many have been brought to Christ under his ministry, many were strengthened in the faith and many have gone to their heavenly reward.

IN SERVICE.

MAKE use of me my God;
Let me not be forgot.
A broken vessel cast aside.
One whom thou needest not.

I am thy creature, Lord,
And made by hands divine;
And I am part, however mean,
Of this great world of thine.

Thou usest all thy works:
The weakest things that be;
Each has a service of its own
For all things wait on thee.

Thou usest the high stars,
The tiny drops of dew,
The giant peak and little hill—
My God, O use me, too.

MADE OVER AGAIN.

THE impression is abroad that you must fix up the Gospel to suit the age, instead of fixing up the age to suit the Gospel; and the young men coming out of our theological seminaries have the impression that they must palliate the prejudices of society, and must cover over the natural rottenness of the human heart, and that they must tell men what very clever people they are, and that they only need to be pressed in a little one way, and pulled out a little the other way, and then they will be all right. And they say: "All you want is development." Is it? Development! You might as well go to a man bent double with the cramps of Asiatic cholera, and tell him that all he wants is development. He needs to have his disease killed so that he may get well. Until our heart is changed by the grace of God, it is scabbed and ulcerous with a great leprosy; and it is not development we want, but it is the cure of an eating, loathsome, blasting, damning leprosy. Our whole nature, throughout and throughout, and throughout wrong, needs to be made over, and over, and over again. I wish that every word of that passage could come down with five tons' weight of emphasis: "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God," though he had given $100,000 to religious institutions, though he never used a bad word in his life, though he paid all his debts, though he lived on the tip-top round of respectability—"Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." But so little do we hear about this doctrine of Regeneration in this day, that it is almost considered indelicate for a man to read in a public assemblage the words of Christ to Nicodemus about the new birth. And as to there being any hell, if we make any allusion to that, it must be with exquisite circumlocution, as the "place of high temperature," or "the world insalubrious," or, as a minister recently called it, "the great elsewhere!" I say to the young men who are studying for the ministry, there is a judgment seat in every man's heart, which tells him that the Bible is true, and that if it be true, the wicked and the righteous cannot go to the same place.

LAY WORKERS.

THERE is a fear expressed in some quarter that laymen are taking too active a part in the churches. We have a sly suspicion that the layman who has for seven years given most of his time to the study of the truth, is better prepared [illegible] given that length of time in theological seminaries to the study of what other people say about the Bible. In other words, we like water just dipped from the spring though handled in a gourd, rather than water that has been standing a week in a silver pitcher. After Calvin has twisted us one way, and Arminius has twisted us another, and we get our head full of the old Andover and New Haven Theological fights and the difference between Ante-Nicene Trinitarianism and Post-Nicene Trinitarianism, it is a luxury to meet some evangelist who can tell us in our common mother tongue of Him who came to seek and save that which was lost. We say let our learned institutions push theological education to its highest excellency, preparing men for spheres which none but the cultured and scholarly are fit for, but somehow let us beat the drum and get a battalion of lay workers. We have enough wise men to tell us about fishes, about birds, about rocks, about stars—enough Leyden jars, enough telescopes, enough electric batteries, but we have not more than one man where we ought to have a hundred to tell the story of Christ and the soul.

IS THIS SPRING?

WE just now read in one of our excellent contemporaries: "Winter is over: Spring is here." Putting the paper down we looked out of the window and saw it snowing. If this be Spring her hair is prematurely white, and she comes around sobbing and crying when we expected to hear from her a merry laugh. If, according to the poet, "Winter lingers in the lap of Spring" then Spring must have a very big lap to hold so much Winter. Merchants, farmers, mechanics and ministers complain bitterly. But no doubt we need just such weather. More sin is committed in complaint against the climate than in any other way. Man's agency is mixed up in almost everything else and we may have reason to blame somebody for other disorders, but man has nothing to do with the weather. He who indicts that, indicts God. As uncertain and undesirable as these storms may appear to us, we would rather continue to have the climate Divinely arranged than by any Congressional Committee we know of. There are few who would want to take the contract for furnishing a year's storms. We suppose that when the world's history is all made up and the accurate statistics are furnished, it will be found that there did not fall one snow flake too many and that we all had in our climate and in our life the right proportion of smiles and tears. Readers, you had better stop scolding the weather.

MODERN PERSECUTION.

A GREAT complaint comes from many quarters about the ladies' high hats because they obstruct the view of audiences, and a lady reporter asked me the other day what I thought about it, and I told her that if the indecent pictures of actresses in the show windows of our cities were accurate, as pictures of what goes on in many of the theatres night by night, then it would be well if the ladies' hats were a mile high so as to completely obstruct the vision. If professed Christians go to such places during the week, no one will ever persecute them for their religion, for they have none and they are the joke of hell. But let them live a consecrated and Christian life and they will soon run against sneering opposition. For a compromise Christian character an easy time now, but for consecrated behavior, grimace and caricature. For the body, thanks to the God of free America, there are now no swords or fiery stakes, but for the souls of thousands of the good, in a figurative sense, rack and gibbet and Torquemada.

What an exciting scene in India when during the Sepoy rebellion a regiment of Highlanders came up and found the dead body of one of General Wheeler's daughters, who had been insulted and mauled and slain by the Sepoys. So great was the wrath against these murderers that the Scotch regiment sat down, and cutting off the hair of this dead daughter of General Wheeler, they divided it among them, and each one counted the number of hairs given him, and each took an oath, which was executed, that for each hair of the murdered daughter they would dash out the life of a miserable Sepoy. But as we look over the story of those who in all ages have suffered for the truth, while we leave vengeance to the Lord, let us band together in one solemn vow, one tremendous oath, after having counted the host of the martyrs, that for each one of those men and women who die for the truth, an immortal soul shall live, live with God and live forever.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

If any of our readers who know of active, zealous Christian workers in their neighborhood who, without fee or reward, are devoting time and means to the service of Christ in rescuing the lost, uplifting the fallen, or befriending the sick and poor, would send us biographical sketches of such persons—men or women—we should be glad. The story of their work, showing their methods and the success which has attended them, might encourage other Christian people to undertake similar work in their cities. The sketch should be accompanied in every instance by a photograph of the person. Address Editor of Christian Workers' Department, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

Mrs. Frank Tucker, Belleville, Kans. Is there a passage of Scripture in the Bible that reads: "The Lord tempers the wind to the shorn lamb?"

The passage you quote is from Rev. Laurence Sterne's writings. Its Scriptural parallel is 1. Cor. 10: 13.

Jennie L. Heckman, Plainville, Mass.; Contributor, Birchton, N. Y., and other readers who have inquired where back numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can be used to advantage in school, mission, hospital or other work, should send them to any one of the following addresses:

Mrs. S. J. Anders, S. W. Hospital, Marion, Va.; Mrs. H. F. Cobb, Wardwell Home, Saco, Me.; E. C. Gillingham, Light-keeper, Musgrave Harbor, Newfoundland; Mrs. G. J. Ansbaugh, Fayette, Fulton Co., Ohio.

J. Cross. In our Sunday School lesson for March 3d, the subject of lesson was the "Raising of Lazarus." Commentators say Jesus wept on two other occasions. We can only find where he wept but twice: once over Lazarus' grave, and again over the city of Jerusalem. How many times is it recorded that Jesus wept?

The commentators to whom you refer may have had in mind a statement made by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. 5:7), that Christ shed tears on another occasion, presumably in the Garden of Gethsemane.

M. R. P., Franklinton, N. C. Does the expression of Luke 19: 5 mean that Zaccheus was in the habit of restoring four-fold, or that it was his intention to do so?

It was a resolution made as a result of the state of heart induced by Christ's condescension in visiting the man whom all the public hated and loathed, and by converse with Christ. To wrong a man, and restore to him four-fold would have been ridiculous as a habit. Zaccheus meant to clean up his life and make restitution for wrongs done in the past.

A. H. W., Shelby, Mich. In some of our International Lesson Leaves the Revised Version is given and I notice that it omits Matt. 18: 11. Is it right to use a Version that is imperfect and is not this omission in contravention of the warning in Revelation 22: 19 against taking away words of the Bible?

The verse to which you allude is not lost; it is given in Luke 19: 10. The Revisers doubtless found that the earliest copies of Matthew's Gospel did not contain the text. They would have no other reason for omitting it. They had but one object in their revision and that was to secure absolute accuracy, and every lover of God's Word must surely be in sympathy with that object. They would not be liable to the condemnation referred to. The previous verse (Rev. 22: 18), is equally severe on persons who add to the words of the book and as the passage in Matthew appears to have been interpolated, the threats apply to the interpolator rather than to the Revisers, if to any one.

M. S. How can a housekeeper arrange her duties so as to keep the Sabbath? This question is so perplexing to me that I submit it to your readers who are housekeepers, for an answer. The house-work may be lightened for the Sabbath by preparing the food and putting the house in order on Saturday, but some things still remain, such as cleaning up bedrooms, serving meals, washing dishes, etc. Are these things a violation of the fourth commandment?

We would be pleased to receive the opinions of our housekeeping readers in reply to the very interesting letter of "M. S.," as this is a subject that ought to be practically considered in every Christian home in our land. All letters should be brief and to the point, however.

Subscriber, Kewanee, Ill. Is it right for the Trustees of a Christian church to lease a room in their house of worship which has been dedicated to the service of God and in which the prayer meetings are usually held, and for Sunday School purposes, to the township to hold an election in?

If no other place is available for the purpose, there can be no serious objection to holding the election there. The securing of good government is one of the most serious responsibilities of citizenship, and it would be a vast improvement on present methods if political gatherings, instead of being held in barrooms and drinking-halls, were conducted in place whose character and associations would tend to impart a moral tone to politics. A step in this direction has been taken in England where such meetings are held in school houses and fire stations, where no other suitable places are available.

J. P. Lambert, Cincinnati. 1. What number of individuals hold the major portion of the wealth of the United States, and how many hold what may be termed colossal fortunes? 2. How does our country compare with England in this respect?

1. It is estimated that seventy individuals possess wealth aggregating $2,200,000,000, having an average of $35,000,000 each. One family alone is represented as holding $150,000,000. Besides the seventy mentioned, there are about fifty others who hold over $10,000,000 each. Individual holdings are larger here than in England, where the largest possessor is said to hold about $50,000,000, and the next largest $40,000,000. America has a much larger number of millionaires, or owners of great fortunes than any other country in the world.

The following additional names have been received as members of the Corresponding Circle for spiritual improvement, suggested by "Reader." Ont., Can.:

Newman Sheldon, Lamont, Ia. How do you account for the miracle of the sun standing still? According to my understanding of science, the stopping of the earth would involve its utter lapse?

The miracle has never been explained in a way acceptable to scientific men. It is not conceivable that the earth stopped its rotation on its axis. That motion is at about the rate of a thousand miles an hour and it is improbable that God would interpose to slacken it. It is more probable that whatever the miracle was it was concerned with the laws of light rather than with the law of the earth's motion. The miracle of refraction prolonging daylight, or as some commentators suppose prolonging darkness, would involve far less disturbance of natural law and would be far more in accord with what we know of God's ways of work.

Mrs. R. C. Ross, Sumas, Wash. Is it any more wrong to ride on a bicycle to church on Sunday than to ride on a buggy or street car? Is there any command in the Bible to keep the Lord's Day as the Jews kept their Sabbath?

There can be little moral difference between the act of riding on a bicycle and riding in a buggy or street-car, and what difference there is, is in favor of the bicycle, because it does not involve work for others. The answer to what you refer did not condemn bicycle riding on Sunday except as recreation or pleasure. If the church is too far away to walk to it, there can be no harm in going on a bicycle. There is no command in the New Testament requiring the Sabbath observance practised by the Jews. The Christian is put on his honor. In observing the Lord's Day he will give to the Lord intelligent service and the consecration of his and thought and effort, which is better than the minute, machine-like observance that our Saviour condemned in the Pharisees.

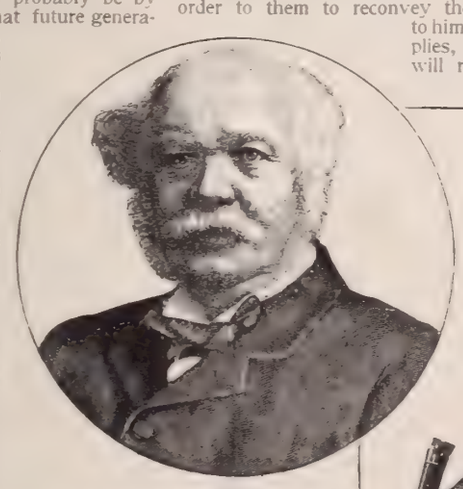
THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

DEATH OF THREE NOTED MEN.

MARCH was a fatal month for the world's notabilities. Portraits are given on this page of three of the eminent men whose places death has made vacant. Each had filled an important position and each had special, though widely different claims on the world's respect. Sir Henry Rawlinson had distinguished himself as a soldier, a statesman, and an antiquary. He commenced his public career in India as an officer in the army of the East India Company. He did efficient service in the Afghan war, and won a brilliant reputation for bravery and sagacity. Subsequently he held high positions in the East India Company's service, serving in Persia and other lands. There he devoted himself to antiquarian studies. The clue to the cuneiform hieroglyphs had just been discovered, and Sir Henry Rawlinson pursued the study, translating some of the longest and most important inscriptions. It will probably be by his antiquarian works that future generations will remember him.

Professor Blackie was among the best known of Scottish scholars. In every land are men occupying responsible positions and doing valuable work who owe the development of their powers to the wise counsel and excellent training they received at the hands of Prof. Blackie in Edinburgh University. A man of profound learning, yet versatile, full of energy and good spirits, he won the enthusiastic admiration of the young men of the University, and he was loved and revered throughout Scotland for his manly courage and the vigorous patriotism manifested by tongue and pen. Few men pass out of life as honored and beloved for their personal qualities by many men of emi nence to whom they have rendered service. A very different man from the other two, was Ismail Pasha, ex-Khedive of Egypt, who also died during the month. He was a grandson of Mehemet Ali, the founder of the dynasty which has ruled Egypt for nearly a century. When he succeeded his uncle, Said Pasha, as Khedive, the rulers of Egypt were merely representatives of the Turkish Sultan; but the vigor of his government, his large enterprises and his masterly foreign policy compelled the Sultan to recognize the autonomy of Egypt, and make the throne hereditary in his family. Chiefly through his loyalty to Lesseps, and his fidelity to his promises, the Suez Canal became an accomplished fact. He did much in other ways for the development of the historic land. But the difficulties of his task, his lavish extravagance, and his impatience of control, finally involved his downfall. He was deposed, and died in exile. In a few days, death carried away all three of these distinguished men. Different as they were in station, in genius and in the spheres they occupied, they were alike in having to pay to the common lot of humanity. They were alike, too, in the claim they have on the remembrance of the world. Each will be estimated by the service he rendered to his fellow-men. (Matt. 26: 13.)



SIR HENRY RAWLINSON.

PROF. JOHN STUART BLACKIE.

THE EX-KHEDIVE OF EGYPT.

Family Lawsuit.

One of the law courts in New York is being appealed to for the settlement of a family dispute. Seven years ago a widower was living in the Harlem district with his three daughters who kept house for him. He owned a row of small houses down town which produced a good income, but required considerable attention in looking after the repairs, in securing the right kind of tenants, collecting the rents, etc. The man's health became bad, and he was unable to look after the property himself. There was some talk of his employing an agent, but his daughters dissuaded him. They offered to take charge of the houses for him if he would convey them to them. Ultimately he consented, as he intended to leave the houses to the girls when he died. He therefore gave them a legal conveyance of the property on the express stipulation that so long as he lived they should pay him the entire rentals, after deducting the payments for taxes and repairs. During the seven years that have elapsed since the property was turned over, two of the daughters have married and the situation has naturally changed its aspect. The payments have become irregular, and the accounts for repairs have increased beyond all precedent. The father complains that he has been unable to obtain any statement, and the only benefit the property is to him is some small sums doled out to him grudgingly at long intervals. The girls treat the property as their own and do not recognize his claims at all. He therefore asks the court to issue an order to them to reconvey the property to him. If it complies, the girls will regret their undutiful conduct. Many a Christian has felt similar regret when financial ruin has come upon him. Looking back on the days of his prosperity, he realizes that he treated his property as his own and not as a trust which God committed to him to be used as his representative in the world. (1 Chron. 29: 14.)

Indestructible Infection.

The results of some remarkable experiments conducted by the German bacteriologist, Messner, were communicated recently to a medical publication in this country. Among them were a series of experiments conducted with the object of discovering the surest means of destroying the microscopic creatures which, it is now found, are the sources of the most dreaded diseases. One of the experiments consisted in infecting leaden rifle balls with severed species of bacteria. Tin boxes were filled with gelatine which had been carefully purified. Elaborate tests were applied, so that the professor could be absolutely certain that no living organisms existed in the gelatine. The infected rifle balls, each with its peculiar species of bacteria, were fired into the gelatine. In a short time afterward, a microscopic examination of the gelatine targets revealed the fact that in every case, the bacteria had survived the shock of the discharge from the rifle and were living and thriving in the gelatine. As a proof that they had not reached the gelatine in any other way than by the bullet, the professor mentions that each target had the peculiar species of bacteria that had been put on the bullet and no other species. It seems sometimes as if evil and sin were as indestructible as the bacteria. A bad saying or a bad book goes out working mischief in spite of all that can be done to counteract it and continues its action long after the man who has orignated it, or sent it forth, is dead. (Matt. 12: 35, 36.)

Wise Too Late.

A prominent New York merchant is lamenting his disregard of a warning. He has a very extensive business which he founded as a young man. It was very small at first, but he put into it all his energy, watched every detail and attended personally to all its ramifications. He devoted twelve hours of the day to it, taking no vacations. As the business grew, its demands on him increased. He could not be induced to intrust any part of the management to subordinates, but still retained the direction of it in his own hands. Day after day he might be found early and late in his office, with thirty type-writers around him, to whom he dictated his enormous correspondence. Some years ago he was warned that he would break down in some way. He said he felt no indications of it, but should take a rest by and by. A year ago he noticed that his sight was not as good as formerly, and he consulted an oculist, who ordered him to quit work at once and take a long rest. He said he could not do it then, but would arrange his affairs so as to quit in a few months. Recently he went again to the oculist and told him that he had made his arrangements and was now ready to rest for six months or a year. "Ah," said the oculist, "it is too late now. In four months you will be totally blind. Nothing can save you. A rest when you first came would have averted the calamity, but nothing can do so now." The merchant finds the opinion true. Slowly, but surely, the darkness is closing in on him. Distressing as his situation is, it is not so bad as will be that of some young people who say to their Christian friends, as Felix said to Paul, "Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season I will call for thee." (Acts 24: 25.)

An Immigrant's Gratitude.

The peculiar form taken by the gratitude of an Irish immigrant is shown in a letter he wrote to a benefactor, which has found its way into a Boston journal. It appears that the Irishman was bravely struggling to make a living in his native land, but was continually thwarted by one misfortune or another. It seemed to him a hopeless struggle, and he longed most ardently to come to America, where he felt sure his industry and enterprise would be rewarded. But he had not the funds to pay his passage, nor had he anything that he could sell that would bring enough for the purpose. A benevolent man who heard of the poor fellow's vain desire, sent him his passage money. He lost no time in crossing the Atlantic, and on his arrival wrote to his benefactor a letter of thanks. After assuring him of his undying gratitude, and that if he succeeded, he would surely pay back the money advanced, he added a characteristic inquiry. He wrote: "Is there anyone here that ever done anything to injure or offend you that your honor would like anything to be done to? I'd like to do something for your honor to show how thankful I am." If Christians would show their gratitude to Christ in the same way, this would be a much happier world. Christ wants no such service done as the Irishman wanted to render, but there are many people here who have injured him and offended him, and he would like to have them enlightened as to his readiness to forgive, and as to his infinite love to them. Those who want to show Christ how thankful they are, need not lack opportunity. (Luke 24: 47.)

A Society Has Been Organized in London, called the Police Court Mission, to help in reclaiming persons, especially young men, who are arrested on comparatively slight charges. During the past year it has taken hold of 15,855 cases, and its success is most encouraging. It specially aims to reach persons arrested for the first time, who feel the stigma of the arrest, and are liable to become reckless if they are not encouraged to reform

The work contemplated, as described by a member of the committee, "is not the establishment of churches, but rather to better the condition of the poor, through discriminating charity; to lift up the depraved by bringing them into the social clubs which will be formed for men and boys, and to let a little sunshine into the outcast's life by giving her an opportunity to live in honor."

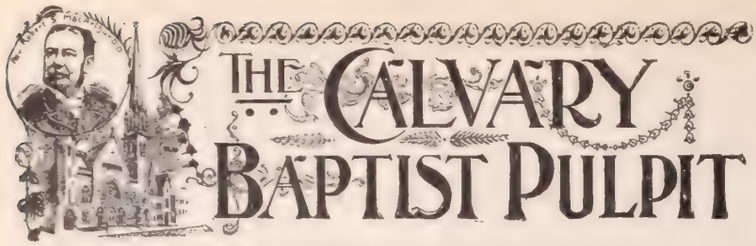
Dr. L. W. Munhall's Meetings, at Saginaw, Mich., are stirring the whole city. The "Courier-Herald" of March 12, says, that the services on the previous Sunday surpassed anything ever witnessed there. Dr. Munhall has devoted his attention to special classes, holding meetings for his G. A. R. comrades, for railroad men and their families, for men only, for women only, and for young people.



OUR LORD'S MYSTERIOUS SORROW.

Sermon preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, by Robert Stuart MacArthur. Text: Matt. 26: 38, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death."

OUR object this morning is to discuss some of the elements of our Lord's mysterious sorrow in the garden. The subject is one of deep solemnity and of equal tenderness. Not at all times, nor in all frames of mind and heart, is it fitting to discuss such a subject as this. As Moses removed his shoes when he approached the holy ground of the burning bush, so should we strive to banish all unholy thoughts as we walk beneath the olive trees of Gethsemane and gaze on the Cross of Calvary. The history of the race is one of sin and sorrow; it is also one of grace and glory. Three wonderful gardens are there in that history—Eden, Gethsemane, Paradise. Lost in Eden, we may be redeemed in Gethsemane, and those who are thus redeemed shall be glorified in Paradise. The first is a history of sin and sorrow on our part; the second is a history of sorrow without sin on Christ's part; the last will be a scene of neither sin nor sorrow. We look with shame to Eden, with sorrow to Gethsemane, and with humble, holy joy to Paradise. But Gethsemane we must visit before we can reach Paradise. To that scene of sorrow let us go this morning.

The Garden of Sorrow.

We go out of the eastern gate of the city of Jerusalem down a steep and abrupt hill, across the bed, over which, at certain seasons of the year, passes the dark-flowing Kedron, and now on our right lies the Garden of Gethsemane. It is a small plot of ground, nearly square, and now surrounded with a fence of rough stone surmounted with stucco. Within the enclosure are eight venerable olive trees. Beneath the shade of perhaps similar trees Christ bowed in his agony. It is night in Jerusalem. The lights are out. The streets are silent. The pilgrims are in their tents on the hillside asleep. The moon at this Passover season shines brightly. Christ and eleven of his disciples pass over the track we have described and enter the garden. Eight disciples are left near the entrance; three—the elect within the elect, the three who were admitted to witness the miracle of raising the ruler's daughter, the three who had been with him "in the holy mount," and having seen the glory of the transfiguration, were prepared for the humiliation of the garden—he takes with him to a little distance within the shade of the garden. And now the wave of his mysterious sorrow rolls over him. Even from these three disciples he withdraws himself a little space. He prays; he returns; he departs to pray; he returns; he departs; he kneels; he falls prostrate; he agonizes, and great drops, as it were, of blood fall upon the ground. He triumphs. The contest is over; the conquest is won. He returns in calmness to his sleeping disciples and awaits in perfect peace the approach of his betrayer. This great sorrow is something to us "who pass by." We shall "behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto his sorrow."

Why Christ Grieved.

This is a mysterious sorrow. Some of its elements, however, we can understand. Let us reverently examine these, and see whether they will explain its intensity and bitterness. The ingratitude of those for whom he lived and died was an element in that sorrow. Christ was keenly alive to every expression of ingratitude. There are many hints given of this fact. He healed ten lepers. Nine went their way; one returned to express joy and gratitude. Christ asks sadly after the nine selfish and ungrateful ones. He said mournfully that he came unto his own, but they received him not. His heart revealed its deep loneliness when he compared himself with the foxes who had holes and the birds who had nests, while he had not where to lay his head. Earth, cursed by sin, had no resting-place for its Maker and Lord. When it would exalt him it did so by a cross; when it would crown him it did so with thorns. How a child's ingratitude breaks a parent's heart! How the ingratitude of the poor dries up the fountains of love in the hearts of the benevolent rich! Christ was subject to a similar law. His nation's ingratitude and hate were a heavy sorrow. His own family even did not believe in him. The people who shouted "Hosanna" one day, shouted "Crucify" the next. Is it not also true that the ingratitude of all rejecters, in every age, was present to his mind? If so, then, friends, our hardness of heart, our unbelief, our disobedience, was an element in Christ's sorrow. You unconverted children of godly parents, hearers but not doers of the Word, you rolled a wave of sorrow over Christ's soul. Oh, look to-day into that garden where Jesus groans and prays for you! See his tear-stained face! Hear his agonizing moan! Then let your heart break and your stubborn will relent. Oh, friends, unreconciled to God, your procrastination and disobedience are wicked and cruel! Cease now, I pray you, this weak and wicked rebellion. I would win you to Christ now—now while we gaze on him in the garden.

Your Ingratitude,

The treachery, denial and desertion on the part of his friends made another element in that nameless sorrow. While this sorrow was, in some of its elements, far above human thought, in other elements it was intensely human. It was sad enough to Christ that of all that vast host that welcomed him on Sunday there should not be one on Friday to utter a word in his behalf. It was sad enough that all the thousands whom he had cured, fed, and blessed in so many ways, not one would stand by him in Pilate's hall. There was but one who spoke a word in his defence, and that one did not belong to the chosen people—the wife of the heathen Pilate. But saddest of all, in the chosen twelve one was a betrayer, one a denier, and all were deserters. "They all forsook him and fled." Oh, base ingratitude! Oh, shameful cowardice! But shall I speak harshly of them and not also justly of ourselves? Their minds were distracted with many doubts which now are cleared away. They groped in the dawn; we walk in the noon-day. Their sin was great; ours is greater. Many times since then has Christ been by his professed friends. In social life, in the marts of trade, in the halls of sinful amusement, Jesus has been despised and rejected. And all this he foresaw. That wicked act of yours last week was a pang in Christ's heart. That absence from the house of God; that neglect of family or secret prayer—oh, these were parts of Christ's great sorrow on that terrible night! Shall we continue in sin? Can we, dare we, love and practice that which slew our Lord?

The sorrows to which his people would be exposed were an element in that grief. The joys and sorrows of his people Christ made his own. On this Thursday night he realized—perhaps even more than he did on the previous Sunday, when he wept over Jerusalem—what the Jewish nation incurred by his rejection. He saw that Jerusalem, the city of song and story, would soon be destroyed. He saw that God's chosen people would soon be scattered over the earth. Scattered over the world, despised and hated of all men, the Jews were to see their land trodden by the foot of the heathen Roman and the infidel Turk. Their prayer was answered. The blood of Christ was upon them, not to save, but to destroy. Now, to Jesus as a man, a patriot, and a Saviour, the blindness and madness of his people became a cause of intense and bitter grief. He saw, too, the sorrows which were to come on Christian believers. Those of his nation who accepted him—as well as those who rejected him, though in different ways—were to suffer sorrow. Of all the disciples with him in the garden, John probably was the only one who was to die a natural death. James first was to seal his testimony with his life. Peter, like his Lord, was to be crucified. The disciples who afterward believed on his name were to suffer persecution. Stephen, from the fast falling shower of stones, was to go up to Christ at the right hand of God. Paul was present to Christ's view—Paul "fighting with beasts at Ephesus," "shamefully entreated at Philippi," cruelly imprisoned and beheaded at Rome. Huss, Luther, Bunyan, thousands of whom the world was not worthy, suffered for their Lord—these in Christ's thoughts—these added to Christ's grief.

The Coming Pain.

There was also a shrinking from the painful and shameful death of the cross. Let us not hesitate to say so. Christ was truly a man. True manhood is not indifferent to danger and suffering. Coarse and brutal natures may assume a stoicism which refined and cultivated natures cannot manifest. Dr. Parker, in "Ecce Deaus," finely illustrates this thought. "Suffering," he says, "is a question of nature. The educated man suffers more than the uneducated; the poet probably suffers more than the mathematician; the commanding officer suffers more in a defeat than the common soldier. The more life, the more suffering, the billows of sorrow being in proportion to the volume of our manhood. Now, Jesus Christ was not merely a man; he was man; and by the very compass of his manhood he suffered more than any mortal can endure. The storm may pass as fiercely over the shallow lake as over the Atlantic, but by its very volume the latter is more terribly shaken." Christ's physical organization even, was, doubtless, exquisitely sensitive. Then there were the moral issues involved. Perhaps it is true, as has been claimed, that Christ died of a literally broken heart. He certainly keenly felt the pain and disgrace of His Ignominious Death.

To assume even for a time the character of a felon is to a holy soul painful in the extreme. Actors of high reputation find it opposed to their taste to represent a character famous only for vileness. Christ's shrinking was natural and proper. It is a mark of honor and glory befitting the God-man. I give due weight to all these considerations. But I affirm that they do not of themselves account for his deep and awful sorrow. He must have known—he foretold it many times—that he was to rise from the dead on the third day. The grave could not hold him. His physical sufferings at the worst would be short. The victory was near. It was to be a brief darkness followed by a never-ending brightness. Who can believe this was more than an element—and compared with other elements, an unimportant one—in his sorrow? Martyrs in Christ's name and for his sake have gone joyfully to the stake. They have shouted amid fagots and flames. They have gone to the block singing songs of triumph. They have lain in prisons of dampness and darkness until the chains rusted into their flesh. Wives and mothers have torn themselves from husbands and children to die for Jesus. We have read of Leonidas and his brave three hundred who stopped the onward march of the Persians at Thermopyiæ, giving their lives joyfully for their country. We know of England's lovely queen who sucked the poison from the wound of the king, her consort, though she knew that death would be the result of her heroism. Again and again have brave soldiers rushed in to take the death-blows intended for their commanders. The pages of history contain the names of many such. Much more has for Christ been seen. What glorious names come to us as we speak! There are thousands who are suffering a daily martyrdom for his sake. There are women tied to drunken and godless husbands and sweetly living for Christ, dying a thousand deaths, while they live a single life. Upheld by the blessed hopes of the Gospel, they never utter a murmur. At this hour there are, believe it, friends, thousands who would gladly lay down their lives for the Master, rather than deny him. Think you, then, that simple fear of physical death could have so burdened and crushed the Son of God—the Lord of life and glor A thousand times no. There was tha there was far more than that.

Willingness to suffer

Another consideration is that Satan w permitted at this time to tempt Christ w peculiar power. Satan tempted Jesus in t wilderness and was repulsed. He left h "for a season." He now returned. It w the last—the death-struggle. It was t world's crisis. The old conflict is to be s tled forever. It is the hour and the pow of darkness." In one garden truth w crushed and error triumphed. The fi Adam was overthrown, shall the seco Adam be overthrown? If so, the knell humanity must be rung, On the result this conflict in this garden depends the p sibility of entering Paradise. If Satan t umph now God is no more God. Hell preciates the struggle. Its artillery hurled against the bowed sufferer. Wh an hour! What a conflict! Here let o hearts break in sympathy with our broke hearted Lord. Oh, be not indifferent wh for you Christ is meeting the temptatio of Satan! Christ is warding off eter death and hell. Behold, behold, him in great agony! Never was there sorrow l that of Jesus.

But the true explanation of the myst ous sorrow in the garden and the aw agony on the Cross—as seen in the cr to God uttered in both places—is t Christ, the Godman,

The Divine Substitute

was bearing in some way the iniquities a lost world. This is a holy of holies. seems almost irreverent to judge with critic's coolness these awful experienc But such is the teaching of Scripture, al in the Old and New Testaments. "He w bruised for our iniquities." "The L hath laid on him the iniquity of us a "It pleased the Lord to bruise him." (no, the cup could not pass from him! drained it to the very dregs. "He hath m him to be sin for us who knew no si He was "made a curse for us." "W his own self bare our sins in his own b on the tree." He consented to have sins laid upon him. He is treated as transgressor. Oh, matchless love! (transcendent and sovereign grace! Bles doctrine of divine substitution! God found a way to save the lost. Heaven opened to the vilest. With Paul we say, "Oh, the depths of the riches bot the wisdom and knowledge of God

There is a practical application of t truths. First, we see the exceeding sin ness of sin. How lost was man w nothing short of such a sacrifice could s him! Christ cried out in tears and ag when he stood before God in the sinn place. How terrible must it be for a sin on his own behalf, to attempt to stand fore God! Christ sank for a time u the weight of sins not his own. How s we meet God with sins upon us which our own? Second, we see here, as where else,

The Love of God in Christ.

Marvelous love! No mind can conceive heart can feel, no tongue declare its g ness. The world is full of evidence God's love. It is whispered in the wi it flashes in the sunlight, but there i grandest display; "God so loved t world." Third, the duty of immediate mission to Christ is manifest. It is in the extreme to refuse the great salva and dare the wrath of a holy and God. Men and women, in God's na admonish you to-day, come and give y selves to this great Saviour.

Turn now from the cold ground beneath the olive's shade, where on that Thur night Jesus began to give the ransom your soul. Look to that cross on w on Friday he completed the purchase p See him bowing his head in death. his triumphant cry, "It is finished!" cross is at once the world's hope and world's condemnation. It is at once proof of God's great love and man's sin. I lift it before you. Stop, travele eternity, it is something to you that J dies! Is there any sorrow like Chris? But I ask no maudlin sympathy and s mental pity for Jesus. It is not for him for you that I plead. Look from the th den of agony and the cross of shame t throne of glory on which he now sits. yourselves as helpless sinners at his f exclaiming with adoring Thomas, "My Lord and my God," and then shall yo able joyously to say, "Therefore, being tified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ."

WHO ARE THESE?

"WHAT ARE THESE WHICH ARE ARRAYED IN WHITE ROBES?"—Rev. 7 : 13.

ANNA SHIPTON. GEO. C. STEBBINS.

1. Who are these whose songs are sound-ing O'er the gold - en harps a - bove?
2. Who are these that keep their sta - tion Round the great.... e - ter - nal throne?
3. See their robes of daz-zling white-ness, With-out blem - ish, spot or stain;
4. 'Tis the Lamb of God who leads them, And they serve.... Him night and day,
5. Sweet their theme: 'tis still "sal - va - tion Un - to Christ... the Ho - ly One,"

Hark! they tell of grace a - bound - ing, And Je - ho - vah's sov - 'reign love.
They from earth - ly trib - u - la - tion, To their heav'n-ly rest are gone.
See their crowns that grow in brightness, Purchased by the Lamb once slain.
By the heav'n-ly fount He leads them, He hath wiped their tears a - way.
And their sighs of trib - u - la - tion, Change to songs a - round the throne.

D.C.—CHORUS.

These are they..... who washed their robes..... and who washed their robes, these are they who washed their robes made them white..... in the blood of the Lamb..... white, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

THE FIRST-FRUITS.

Watchful Believers to be Caught up to the Clouds to Meet the Lord at his Coming as the First-fruits of the Harvest.

BY REV. G. D. HOOPER.

WHEN we ask in what order or fashion, and when, the Lord's people will be fully and finally gathered to him in the clouds as Paul describes in I. Thess. 4: 17, we find that prophetic students are not agreed. Some hold that the Church must pass through the Tribulation ere it is taken to its Lord; while others think that such a view bedims the ardor of our hope, and hold that nothing of necessity intervenes before the Lord may come and call his people to himself. With deference to some who have been taught of God, and with love to those that differ, we submit that both views are only partially true. Just as in the natural world God sends the seasons in their order, and gives us first-fruits, harvest, and then the vintage, does Scripture teach that, as the ages close, these stages are foretold—that the first aspect of our Lord's coming will be the translation of his ripe and ready, watchful, consecrated ones, as living first-fruits from the great harvest-field; that from the Tribulation which ensues, the harvest of the earth is reaped, or, in other words, the resurrection of the righteous dead, and their translation, together with living believers takes place. When thus all his people are all gathered to himself before the Bema, or judgment seat and allocated their position in the coming Kingdom, he then comes forth to the earth with his people (Zech. 14: 5; Rev. 19: 14), just as before he had come to the clouds for his people. As this view appears to some to divide the Church, and to be otherwise objected to, let us first see what the view really is, and then what evidence it commands.

Observe first, our Lord's return is not a momentary act, but a prolonged process. His first coming appeared as a definite moment to the prophets; but when the time came we find that between his "coming forth," from Bethlehem (Micah 5: 2), and his coming unto Jerusalem as Israel's proffered King (Zech. 9: 9), there lay an interval of three and thirty years. May we not reasonably expect between the first and last stages of his second coming, an interval in which the judgment of the saints, the allotment of rewards, and the Marriage Supper of the Lamb take place? Thus, from the moment when he rises from the right hand of his Father's throne, to his glorious appearing to destroy the Antichrist and to deliver Israel, there will be time for the manifestation of the Man of Sin and the horrors of the Great Tribulation.

There are certain prophecies which speak of the removal of the Church as a whole, giving in the vivid pictures the general view; while others give separate and detailed aspects or stages. Among the former are, I. Thess. 4. 13-18, I Cor. 25: 20-54. But it is with the the latter series of passages we are now concerned. Our Lord distinctly promises to watchful, faithful believers immunity from the Tribulation. While some are overcharged with surfeiting, or marked by other traits of the days of Noah, the word to believers is, "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man" (Luke 21: 36). Clearly such a promise brings living hope to watchful hearts that they shall be taken hence before the woes predicted come to pass. It is our belief that these are identical with the first-fruits of Rev. 14: 1-5, and the Manchild of Rev. 7: 5.

RESURRECTION LIFE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing April 14. Romans 6: 1-12; 20-23.

NEW life is the essential idea of conversion. Christ emphasized it in his talk with Nicodemus and reiterated in his discourses. and it is the chief thought in all Paul's practical teaching. This life is significantly characterized as "Resurrection Life," the old life being dead and cast off and the new life being a new creation. That there is no exaggeration in thus characterizing it, every one who has experienced the change can testify. Extreme cases reveal the principle involved. When a degraded drunkard, who has no pleasure in life apart from his cups, has been rescued from his bondage, all his being is changed. He takes an interest in matters to which he was indifferent before, and has new hopes and pleasures. The reformed gambler and the reformed libertine have a like experience. The old life is past and dead and the new life differs from it as do the lives of different persons from each other. It should be so in every converted man. The principle of death and resurrection applies, even when the former life has been outwardly moral. There is a death of motives, of aims, of ambitions, of aspirations and a resurrection in each case. The man having passed through the change is a different being. Before, he could be moved to a particular course of conduct by the prospect of gain and personal advantage; afterward he learns the meaning of the word duty, and is most concerned about pleasing his Lord. Temptations in various directions awoke a responsive chord in his nature, he was in harmony with sin and yielded himself to it without resistance. After the change has taken place, temptation may and does assail him, but it fails to find anything within him on which it can take hold. The traitor has been expelled from the garrison and no longer stands ready to open the gates. "It is I, August," said a fascinating woman to St. Augustine, meeting him on the street after his conversion. Formerly he would have greeted her warmly, and she was pained by his passing her as a stranger. "But I am not August," he said, as he told her of the new life that was in him. The same man, but transformed into a new man. The old life was dead and his veins were pulsating with resurrection life that had no affinity with the past. The Prodigal, after being welcomed by his father, would have as little liking for the sins that ruined him as for the husks which had been his food. We can imagine his future life being one of self-denial, of loving attendance on his father, of patience under his brother's taunts. As different a life from the one he had lived under that roof before his fall as might be that of another man. To the father it must have been no mere figure of speech that his son had died and was alive again. So, one who realizes in any degree the meaning of Calvary, perceives the meaning of Christ's words, "I if I be lifted up will draw all men unto me." He draws them out of sin to purity, out of selfishness to self-sacrifice, out of hate to love. He gives them his resurrection life.

A HAWAIIAN C. E. SOCIETY.

From Rev. J. A. Cruzan of Honolulu, comes an interesting report of the beginning and progress of Christian Endeavor work in Hawaii, which Dr. Clark publishes in his "Golden Rule." In the course of his letter Dr. Cruzan says:

In November, 1883, steps were taken to organize a young people's society in my church on Christian Endeavor lines, and soon the first Christian Endeavor Society in Hawaii, and, I think, the first outside of America, was born. The number was small, the iron-clad pledge preventing many from joining. Nineteen names were enrolled, and Miss Ella Spooner, Vice-Principal of Oahu College, was the first and the very efficient President. Failing health compelled Miss Spooner to lay down the work, and it fell into other and less efficient hands. The iron-clad pledge was pared down somewhat. The usual result which follows the removal of a spinal column ensued—collapse. But there was life in the society and it would not die.

When the time was ripe, with a copy of that admirable little book, "The Children and the Church," in hand, a thorough organization on strict Endeavor lines was effected. Hon. W. O. Smith, the present attorney-general of the republic of Hawaii, was chosen President, and proved an admirable leader. From that time forward this society has been an efficient factor in the spiritual life of the church with which it is connected, and of this little nation.

What proved helpful among the white foreigners of course must needs find its way into the churches of other nationalities. The Hawaiian, Chinese and Japanese churches in Hawaii have all tried and proved the Christian Endeavor idea to be admirably adapted to the spiritual growth and efficiency of their young people.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR IN MISSOURI.

The progress of Christian Endeavor in Missouri is typical of its progress in other states. The churches that were alive and aggressive early perceived the benefit it might bring in retaining the young people, in enlisting them in active Christian work, and the movement spread from one to another with the rapidity with which the history of the movement everywhere has familiarized us. On this page we give portraits of four of the most prominent workers in the State organization, who were elected a year and a half ago to the chief offices of the Union. These are Mr. Thomas Jones, of Kansas City, who was chosen President; Mr. Edward Altemus of St. Louis, Secretary; Mrs. H. S Gilliam of Kansas City, who had charge of Missionary Work, and Miss Kate H. Haus of St Louis, who was elected Superintendent of Junior Work.

There are now, it appears from a statement in the "The Inland" of St. Louis, over seven hundred Societies in the State Union. Divided according to denominations, the following are the figures: Societies connected with the Christian or Disciples of Christ, 210; Presbyterian, 120; Union Congregations, 109; Cumberland Presbyterian, 86; Congregationalist, 59; Baptist, 19; Methodist Episcopal, South. 15; Methodist Episcopal 12; Methodist Protestant, 11, and the remainder scattered among twelve other denominations, besides five Societies in colleges.

In a historical sketch of the movement in the State, written by Mr. George B. Graff, when he was State Secretary, he says: "In 1885, at the Annual Conference of Endeavor Societies at Old Orchard, Me., I had the honor of being the delegate farthest away from home. At this time, however, there were three societies in Missouri, viz., Pilgrim Congregational, St. Louis, and Clyde and Olivette Congregational, Kansas City, In 1886, a city Union was formed in St. Louis and fourteen societies were reported for Missouri. In 1887, at the Sixth Annual International Convention, twenty-nine societies were reported for Missouri, and a year later, at the Chicago Convention, the report showed ninety societies in the State. In 1888 the Second Annual Conference was held at the First Baptist Church, Kansas City. In 1889 it was seen fit to dignify the annual Conference with the name of the 'State Convention,' which name has since been retained."

Of the beginning of the movement in the State, Mr. Graff says: "In November, 1882, Rev. C. L. Goodell, pastor of Pilgrim Congregational Church of St. Louis, spoke to some of his young people regarding the Society of Christian Endeavor, which was just then becoming known in the East. At that time and for some years previous there was a society in the church known as the Young People's Union. It was found that the constitution of the Union and that of the Y. P. S. C. E., were very much alike. At the suggestion of Dr. Goodell, the Union changed its name to a Christian Endeavor Society and became the first Society in Missouri." Dr. Goodell has since been called to his reward, but not until he had seen the value of the Society, the idea of which he had introduced into his State. This is his testimony, and it is an eloquent one: "The Society of Christian Endeavor, brought from Portland, Maine to St. Louis without injury, is one of the busiest bees in the Pilgrim hive. It brings in honey and comb and finds many wayside flowers that have been overlooked. It comes in every day rich with golden power. It is one of the special helps to the pastor. It is wings for him and flies all over the city."

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The programme for the Ottawa Baptist Convention, is now completed and the "Canadian Baptist" says that from beginning to end "it will be full of interest. The addresses will be on live topics connected with Young People's work, and all conferences will be so arranged as to be helpful to the individual as well as instructive in the manner of conducting societies."

Delegates to the approaching National Convention of the Baptist Young People's Union, who wish to take advantage of any of the side trips should write to the Executive Committee for information. They have secured special rates to all points and have arrangements made for hotel accommodation at reduced rates. Not only time but money will be saved to the visitors to the Convention if they will correspond with the Executive Committee in Baltimore in regard to any and all arrangements which they may desire to make.

Dr. F. L. Wilkins announces that the International Committee of the Baptist Young People's Unions contemplates issuing a badge for the Juniors and invites suggestions as to design.

The Good Citizens' League of India, recently organized for the promotion of temperance and social and political purity in the State, is largely made up of members of Christian Endeavor Societies, Epworth Leagues and Baptist Young People's Unions.

The Anglo-American Y. M. C. A., 14 Rue Montmarte, Paris, trusts that pastors and others visiting the city will not fail to note that "valuable information can be obtained, a good guide to all places of interest recommended, that tea room is 'entre libre,' and a list of lodgings is kept. Already excellent testimony as to the benefits about mentioned has been rendered by a party of Irish and American pastors and friends en route to the Holy Land.

In Liberia Christian Endeavor has gained a strong footing and is spreading rapidly. A Society has been formed in connection with the Grange Mission, Johnsonville, and another among the students of Liberia College.

At the Annual Convention of the Hoboken Leagues, of the Jersey City, N. J., District, held at Hoboken on March 14, the Corresponding Secretary reported 48 Epworth Chapters in the district, 2 Christian Endeavor Societies, 17 Junior Epworth League Chapters, and 1 Junior Endeavor Society, with a total membership of 4,

The Baltimore Committee of the National B. Y. P. U. Convention has arranged that members of the Boys' Brigade to assist the reception committee in directing delegates to their homes. Those who are engaged in this work will wear white caps, with the word "Reception" printed in pale blue upon the front, that they may be easily recognized by those seeking information.

The Baptist Young People of St. Paul, Minn., have organized a city Union for the Christian Culture courses with one member from each church for an Executive Committee. The membership is now over three hundred with the prospect of doubling before the end of the year. The meetings are held at the various churches in turn

People of Ancient Egypt.

Their Land was a Land of Wonder and Enchantments—Social and Domestic Customs—The Training of Children.

ALTHOUGH Egypt for many centuries has been reduced to the grade of a tributary power, the observant traveler in that country finds on every hand visible evidences supporting the claim of former greatness and magnificence. But while these traces of a once great and powerful people still remain, we must go to the earliest historians in order to form an intelligent impression of the people themselves. Glimpses of Egypt are afforded in the Mosaic narrative, that reveal it as a powerful and warlike nation, with rich and populous cities, and a long line of kings whose progenitors reach back to the beginnings of history. Josephus tells us of their fame for wisdom, borrowed from the Phœnicians; their science of mathematics, in which Abraham was their teacher, and their unbroken line of monarchs for fifteen hundred years before the reign of Solomon in Israel. Herodotus, who is supposed to have lived nearly five hundred years before Christ, and who is regarded as "the father of history," describes the people of Egypt, as he saw them while he traveled through their country and listened to their venerable legends and traditions. His record is the fullest and next to the Bible record the oldest. It contains much quaint and curious information touching the people, who were wont to boast that they were the oldest people in the world. This claim, however, one of their kings, Psammeticus, is said to have disproved by a very ingenious test. Two infants were carefully kept apart from human society, their attendants being forbidden to utter a word before them. Their nurses were two goats. One day, when the babes were about two years old, they stretched out their little hands and, according to the legend, lisped "bekkos! bekkos!" This word being Phrygian for "bread," the palm of antiquity was awarded to Phrygia, and the claim of Egypt was declared defeated.

ANCIENT COFFINS.

Among other matters observed during his travels, Herodotus noticed the prevalent love of pleasure and ease, especially among the rich, and a depraved condition of morals generally. Yet the Egyptians, he asserts, were the first nation who held the soul to be immortal, and this latter statement is fully sustained by inscriptions found in recent years. At the social banquets of the rich, as soon as the feast was ended, a painted wooden figure of a corpse in a coffin was shown to each guest, to remind him of the transitory character of the present life and the certainty of death. Cats were held as sacred animals and when one died, all the inmates of a house went into mourning by shaving their eyebrows. The dead canine pets were embalmed and their mummies stored in the sacred city of Bubastes. In the event of an Egyptian house taking fire, the first thing to be saved was the cat. Dogs and lizards were also among the household pets.

One of the greatest of Egypt's kings was Amasis, who was of humble origin. He established many peculiar laws, one being that every man should appear once a year before the governor of his province, and prove, on pain of death, that he was getting an honest livelihood. This law was afterwards in use among the Greeks in the time of Solon. In those long-past ages, social life in Egypt was very simple. Even the wealthy, made comparatively little display, although a rich household might have as many as twenty or thirty servants. Dress was unpretending and even graceful, (as our illustrations, which are prepared from the most reliable archæological data, show). Short linen tunics reaching to a little above the knees, an over-garment also of linen, hanging loose and knotted at the waist, sandals and a head-covering comprised the male attire, while the costume of women was hardly more elaborate. Dwellings were very plain, angular and flat-roofed, stools were used instead of chairs, the tables were usually round, with a single pillar in the centre, and couches had head-rests, not unlike those now in use. Women occupied a considerable place in society and in public affairs, and were by no means kept as secluded as in modern Oriental life, which has very largely come under Mohammedan influence. One wife was the rule, and all children shared the inheritance. Great deference was paid by children to parents, and respect for old age was universal.

A QUEEN AND HER WAITING LADIES. A PRIEST AND A PEASANT MAN AND WOMAN.

TYPES OF THE PEOPLE OF EGYPT IN ANCIENT TIMES.

These descriptions, according to Rawlinson and other eminent writers, apply to a time anterior to Joseph, and under the earliest kings in Egyptian history.

Hindu Girls' Education.

Home-life makes up almost the whole world for the Hindu girl, and the greatest care of the mother is to educate her daughter to be a good housewife. When she is seven, the mother teaches her to cook and to clean pots. Hindus have two kinds of washing: one is the daily washing of every-day apparel; for the clothes are changed every morning after bathing. Every Hindu must bathe before he takes his meals. Religion requires that no food be cooked before the person who cooks has bathed. Hence any woman must bathe before she cooks. A woman first gives a bath to her children than she takes a bath herself, and after that goes to cook. The clothes are changed and washed every day. The little girl washes the small clothes on a stone and hangs them for drying. She assists her mother in many small things. She sweeps the kitchen, she brings the utensils, she cuts and slices vegetables, she pounds and grinds the spices, she takes out the small pebbles from the rice and cleans it in water, and, in short, she does all the petty work, assisting her mother. If she has an infant brother or sister, she feeds it and lulls it to sleep in the cradle. She gathers flowers and weaves them into wreaths with which the Hindu women adorn their hair. Her mother teaches her to sew, to embroider, and to make her toilet, which is simple. By the time she is fifteen she learns all things pertaining to general housekeeping and cookery. Moral and religious teaching are not forgotten. It is pleasing to know that there are now in India, many thousands of homes where the little ones are taught the story of Jesus, and that the precious seed of the Gospel sown by the Zenana missionaries and other Christian workers, is bringing forth fruit an hundred and a thousandfold.

The Birds in Spring.

Signs of early spring are already visible in the return of the birds, but not until the end of April will the feathered songsters be back in their summer habitat in full force. It is astonishing how hardy even the most tiny and delicate birds are. Some years ago, when Dr. Merriman, Chief of the Ornithological Section of the Agricultural Department, was on a scientific expedition in the mountain regions of San Francisco, he encountered flocks of hundreds of beautiful little humming-birds, and he described their habits in a bulletin. They wake up very early in the morning, and go to water at daylight, no matter how cold the weather. When the mornings were often frosty, hundreds came to a spring to drink and bathe at break of day. They would drop down to the water, dip their feet and bellies, and rise and shoot away as if propelled by an unseen power. These tiny birds, however, are essentially creatures of flower and sunshine. Birds rarely die of cold and if kind-hearted people, in severe weather, take care to spare a little for the birds, the birds will take care of themselves—and be a delight and a blessing to all, paying back in those floods of melody which have been aptly called the "poor man's choir," the kindness of their friends.

Good Humor in the Family.

Good humor is rightly reckoned a most valuable aid to a happy home life. An equally good and useful faculty is a sense of humor or the capacity to have a little fun along with the humdrum cares and work of life. We all know how it brightens up things generally to have a lively, witty companion who sees the ridiculous points of things and can turn an annoyance into an occasion for laughter. It does a great deal better to laugh over some domestic mishaps than to cry or scold over them. Many homes and lives are dull because they are allowed to become too deeply impressed with a sense of the cares and responsibilities of life to recognize its bright and especially its mirthful side. Into such a household, good but dull, the advent of a good-humored friend is like sunshine on a cloudy day.

THE LESSON OF THE SUNSET.

SLOW fades the vision of the sky,
The golden water pales,
And over all the valley-land
A gray-winged vapor veils.
I go the common way of all;
The sunset fires will burn,
The flowers will blow, the river flow,
When I no more return.
No whisper from the mountain pine,
Nor lapsing stream shall tell
The stranger, treading where I tread,
Of him who loves them well.

But beauty seen is never lost,
God's colors are all fast;
The glory of this sunset heaven
Into my soul has passed—
A sense of gladness unconfined
To mortal date or clime;
As the soul liveth, it shall live
Beyond the years of time.
Besides the mystic asphodels
Shall bloom the home-born flowers,
And new horizons flush and glow
With sunset hues of ours.

—WHITTIER.

FRANCES WILLARD'S CHILDHOOD.

FRANCES WILLARD'S youth after the first few years of childhood was spent in Oberlin, Ohio. Blue-eyed and precocious, even in her fourth year she had very pronounced ideas of her own about many things. She was a great reader and an irrepressible questioner. In after years she recalled with amusement the fact that her mother used to put the children through a course of peculiar calisthenics.

The next move was to a forest home in Wisconsin, where the family passed a free, wholesome life among the fields and woods, and where the education, already well begun, was continued by studies in poetry, philosophy, botany, and manual work of many kinds, the whole tinctured with a strong leaven of religion. Under such tuition the children grew up self-reliant, truthful and intelligent. They rode and hunted together, worked together and studied in company, like the best of comrades. But even the joys of prairie life may have an end, and the day came when Frances Willard longed for something higher and broader than her backwoods environments. She took a deep interest in abolition, and found her earliest impulse to philanthropy in the Anti-Slavery publications of the day.

With the aid of her brother Oliver, at fourteen she established a little, three-column paper called "The Forest Home Tribune," which they set up and printed on the farm. Her first venture at self-support was as a school ma'am and she solaced herself for the monotony of the drudgery by reading Epictetus and Plato between sessions. Step by step, she rose in the intellectual ladder and every passing year showed a broadening and filling out of that remarkable character which has since become so famous and so widely loved by all in English speaking countries.

Child Questionings.

A child may ask a question on a point that cannot with propriety be made clear to him just yet. In such a case he ought not to be rebuked for seeking light, but an answer of some kind is to be given to him, in declaration of a general truth that includes the specific subject of his inquiry; and then he is to be kindly told that by and by he can know more about this than he can now. This will satisfy a well-disposed child for the time being, while it will encourage him to continue in the attitude of a truth-seeking questioner. A very simple answer to his every question is all that a child looks for; but that is his right, if he comes for it at a proper time and in a proper spirit. A child is harmed if he be unduly checked as a questioner; and he is helped, if he be encouraged and wisely trained by his parents in a child's high prerogative as a questioner.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER VII.

A Game of Bluff.

AGITATED by the disturbance of the morning, Alice hurried away to keep her engagement with the Wilson family. A girl brought up as she had been, could not but be distressed by the scene she had witnessed. The honest Irishwoman, who had championed her cause so unexpectedly, had dealt with her assailant after her own rough fashion, and her method had been effectual. Alice smiled as she remembered Mr. Jackson's woe-begone appearance as he wiped the greasy water from his face. But violence in any form shocked the girl's refined nature, and she wished her tormentor could have been driven away by more gentle means. She was concerned, too, on her champion's account. Mr. Jackson was, as she had too good reason for knowing, a vindictive man and she trembled to think what he might do to revenge himself on the honest woman. Well, she could do nothing at present to avert any mischief that might be impending and she must clear her mind of worry, otherwise she could not do her duty in her new position. So with an effort of will she put the matter aside and thought of her duties to the Wilson girls. She was not used to teaching, and although she was well-educated, she lacked the training which enables the practised teacher to impart knowledge. The work consequently was difficult and as she walked on, she strove to remember the methods of her own teachers.

Alice had not been gone an hour when a policeman appeared at Mrs. Callaghan's door.

"I think you must be mistaken, sir," said the policeman, who knew Mrs. Callaghan; "it is a very decent woman lives here."

"That is the door she came out of before she made the assault," replied Mr. Jackson. The policeman knocked and the door was opened. When Mrs. Callaghan saw the policeman she turned pale, but recovered in a moment when she saw Jackson behind him.

"Good-day, Mr. Murray," she said; "I will be ready to go wid ye in a minute, I was afraid the dirty spalpeen that I washed awhile ago, would be afraid to kape his word, and that I wouldn't be afther having the pleasure of telling the judge a few things that I know about him. You'll see, Mr. Murrav, who the judge will give the dressing down to, me or the dude, you'll see which one will wilt."

"What do you know about me,woman?"

"More nor ye think I do, ye have changed yer clothes since I saw yer last, but yer heart's as black as ever."

During this conversation, Mrs. Callaghan was putting on her bonnet and shawl.

"I just want to send word to a few friends," she went on; "as they wanted to see the fun, and I promised to let them know if the dirty scamp came back, and was fool enough to poke his ugly nose into the fire."

"Officer," said Jackson, "I have an engagement that I had forgotten, which will take me out of town, so I cannot lodge the complaint; you need not make the arrest at present," and he slipped a bill into the officer's hand.

"All right, sir," replied the policeman, winking the eye that was on the side of his country-woman; "it was a mistake, Mrs. Callaghan, we came to the wrong door."

"Where to now, Mrs. Callaghan?" asked the policeman when Jackson had gone.

"The villain had insulted a swate young lady, this morning, and I gives him a bucket of dish water."

"Did ye, now? Och! but you're the one that can't be bate; and what do you know about him, that he was afraid of?"

"Never a thing! Only I judged by his bad face, that if I did know anything about him, it wouldn't be to his credit."

"And its pretty clear you were right. He was afraid to face the music. It was the prettiest game o' bluff I ever saw. That man's done some dirty tricks in his time, I bet and he didn't know which of 'em you could tell about. That's a very good thing about these mean folks. They make a club which better folks can use to make 'em behave. Now you see, Mrs. Callaghan, how it worked in your case. If this man had a clean record he could have gone ahead and you would ha' been in a tight place, for I'm bound to tell you the law is clean ag'in throwing water on a man, let alone it being dirty water. I'd ha' been bound to arrest you if he'd wanted it, much as it would ha' been against my feelings to arrest a friend. It isn't a safe thing to do, Mrs. Callaghan, to throw dirty water on a man you don't know. It's turned out all right this time, 'cause the man couldn't afford to fight, but it might not and I wouldn't do it again. You might not be so lucky next time."

"That's all right, Mr. Murray," said the Irishwoman, laughing. "You needn't be afraid. Thank you for your advice though. I'm generally in luck. I made a bold shot at his record. I knew it was a bluff, but you officers have to do that sometimes and I tried your plan. I've seen it work."

"Och, Mrs. Callaghan, but you're one of 'em, you're one of 'em; and bedad, you did it beautifully, and its on the force you ought to be." He left with a grin all over his face, and stopped on every third and fourth step to repeat to himself with a chuckle; "She's one of 'em."

CHAPTER VIII.

"Caste."

Alice was late at the Wilson mansion, but all were satisfied with the excuse and apology she offered—all except Mrs. Wilson; her face wore a frown. It was very hard for anyone whom she employed in any way to satisfy her; she was very exacting; no one had a right to think of sick mothers or starving children, when such thoughts interfered with her rights or the time for which she was paying. She had been what she called "a sales-lady" herself, and it had been the struggle of years—yes, of her life—to get into society, so of course she was far more exacting and overbearing to those socially beneath her, than others, "to the manner born;" while to those above her she was affable, even cringing, and as a consequence was despised by both.

Alfreda, the elder daughter, was like her mother; Louie was the very opposite of both. She was a beautiful girl, graceful in form and movement; her dark blue eyes were perhaps the most noticeable feature of her face; they were large, with long lashes, and they always opened wide when she spoke to you, and looked you straight in the face, and you read honesty in their very depths. She was an affectionate, generous girl, but straightforward and outspoken in everything. Her mother would often remark with a deprecating sigh: "Poor Louie, she does not know the meaning of the word policy, and I don't know what will become of her."

Alice and Louie were friends from their first meeting, and this friendship grew stronger at every subsequent meeting, and many a battle did Louie fight for Alice, behind her back.

"I do wish, Louie, you would learn to treat servants as servants, and not as equals," said Mrs. Wilson on one occasion, after Alice had left the house. "I have noticed that you treat that girl as if she was a friend, and an equal."

"Then I have wronged her," replied Louie, "and she is the one to complain, for she is my superior in birth and breeding and in every accomplishment that we have touched on yet."

"A person may be educated, and yet not be a lady, especially if she has to use her education to gain a living," said Mrs. Wilson.

"And could she be a lady without the education," asked Louie.

Mrs. Wilson hesitated a moment and then replied: "Certainly, if she has wealth and position."

"A bricklayer might be able to show a gentleman how to build a wall; but that would not make the mechanic a gentleman," put in Alfreda.

"And if the gentleman should have to use that knowledge afterward as a necessity, would that destroy his gentility," asked Louie.

"Yes, certainly," replied her mother; "he would lose his caste. He would forfeit his position as a gentleman, and we could no longer associate with him."

"Well, there's where we differ," cried Louie. "I think Abraham Lincoln was as much a gentlemen when he was splitting rails as when he was President of the United States. Just as much and no more. The people of the United States could not make a gentleman. As I understand it, their votes were just an expression that they had found a man of worth. Why, Freda,

Health Broken Down

From any cause, finds a corrective and health-restorative in Hood's Sarsaparilla, the great blood purifier:

"I had a severe attack of rheumatic fever which left me in bad condition, weak and with kindey troubles and headache. I was much alarmed and knew my condition must be improved or I would never get well. I began to take Hood's Sarsaparilla and it did me a great deal of good. My general health is much improved, and the headaches, which formerly lasted three weeks at a time, never trouble me." ELLA C. ELLIS, Roxbury, Vermont.

lice is a lady, I am convinced, by birth, id you can see she has the education. I lieve she could teach us, not only music, awing, French, and such things, but also ow to be a lady in the true sense of the ord."

"I have never discovered any of these onderful characteristics of the lady in her, id I doubt whether anyone, other than ourself ever has, but then, you would be miliar with your dressmaker, and treat our governess as an equal," replied Al-eda.

"If they were ladies I would," said Louie.

"Louie, you make me angry," said her other, "how could they be ladies?"

"Well, I'll tell you, mamma. Now, to-ay, Alice translated a French quotation r Al. and told her who wrote "Pensees r la Religion."

"Well, a person could do all that and not a lady," said Alfreda.

"Oh, yes," said Louie, "I don't contend at a girl is a lady simply because she can anslate a French idiom, or knows what ooks Blaise Pascal wrote. But Alice ave another indication a few moments terwards that was good evidence of her ing a lady. When the talk turned on Middlemarch' and 'Romola' and you and amma spoke of the author as 'he and m,' Alice never smiled. I was near laugh-g at you both because I knew they were ritten by a woman, but Alice kept her ountenance and I thought then it was a ery delicate thing to do and that in doing she showed that she was more of a lady an I was."

"And pray, why should she not have ept her countenance," asked Mrs. Wilson, ho had referred to a book on the shelf ar her when her daughter spoke. "What as there for either you or she to laugh at? ere is the name of the author on the title-ge—'George Eliot.'"

"Oh, an ill-bred person would have ughed at your blunder, mamma. Every e who knows anything at all of ooks, knows that George Eliot was mere-a name assumed by a lady whose real me was Marian Evans. You and Alfreda owed your ignorance and I thought Alice ould have smiled, but she did not and en I thought how well-bred she was."

"Perhaps she did not know herself. I n't believe she did know and it was her siness to know all these things. I will eak to her about it, for I don't want ig-rant persons coming to teach my daugh-rs."

"Oh! mamma, you will do no such thing," ied Louie; "in the first place it would not honest, and in the next place, I'm sure lice is one of the best read girls I have er met; she helps me with my French nd German more than my real teacher, nd I want you to be kind to her and treat er like a lady; by-and-bye you will be ad that you have done so; I just love er, and want you to do the same, it will o you good and her, too, for I feel certain at she is suffering from some great sor-w, and needs sympathy and love."

Louie, you are too absurd! You cannot ix up people of different classes. We be-ng to one class and this Alice person be-ngs to quite another. While she receives ay for doing work she is practically a ser-ant," said Mrs. Wilson. "I may give harity, but never love, to servants! and I m grieved to think that I have a daughter hose tastes are so low that she considers necessary to lower herself to their level, in rder to find an object on which to lavish er affections."

Having unburdened her mind in this nanner, she swept out of the room, leaving ouie with her great eyes wide open, and a ook on her face as if she wanted to cry or augh, and was undecided which to do.

It was a singular coincidence that while he foregoing talk was going on in the Wil-on mansion the same question of caste nd class distinction was being solved in nother way in the poor tenement house where Alice lived. Mrs. Mapleton belonged o the same social set as Mrs. Wilson, and o some extent, and with somewhat better eason, had the same sense of superiority over others that Mrs. Wilson had been ex-pressing.

When Alice came home from her duty in he Wilson household, she found her moth-r looking more cheerful than was her wont, nd learned, to her surprise, that she had been working.

"Working, mother!" she exclaimed, "at what, pray?"

"Well, you know I told you that one day a drunken man came into our room, and the Irishwoman came in and turned him out, almost before I knew he was in?"

"Yes," answered Alice.

"Well, she came in after that to tell me not to be afraid, and that she knew that I was ill, and that you were away, and so, had kept a watch on our door, and the drunken man coming in before she had time to prevent him, she had taken the liberty of coming because she knew I was alone; she said that she knew by the sweet young lady whom she had often seen, that we were born ladies, and that man was no company of ours. Then she asked me if I would like to have her little girl wait on me sometimes, when you were away."

"How kind of the good woman; wasn't it, mother?"

"Yes, Alice, my child, but do you know, although she had saved me from a dreadful fright, I felt my pride rising, and was going to be offended, and say something about people knocking at the door before they entered, but I am so glad that I thought for a moment, for in that moment I saw what a silly, proud, ungrateful creature I had become, or had always been, without knowing it. So I held out my hand and thanked her, and said I should like the little girl to come, but was sorry that I was unable to pay for anything she was kind enough to offer.

"Then she said, 'Don't talk about pay, mum; my girl just worships you and your shwate daughter, shure, an' it's talk that'll do more for the child than all the sarvice she can be.'

"Well," continued Mrs. Mapleton, "I have taken a great fancy to the quiet, pretty, little girl, and in trying to interest and instruct her, have really benefited myself."

"Oh, I am so glad that you and the good woman are friends—but isn't it strange that although the little girl has been so much with you, I have only caught a glimpse of her once? But what about the work that has made you so happy?"

"Oh," said Mrs. Mapleton, "I saw that the little girl was really pretty, and if properly dressed would be a lovely child, so it occurred to me that there were some old dresses of yours in one of the trunks; one of them was an old blue silk, that you had when you were a little girl. I took it and went to work and made it over. I have been working a whole week at it, and have just finished it to-day, so I dressed her and curled her hair, and with the addition of some bits of lace I found, I made her look like another being; indeed she looked so sweet, I took her in my arms and kissed her.

"But you should have heard the mother when little Nora went home. I could hear her from here, crying: 'Och! did ye's iver see the loikes o' tha! och, the darlint, sure an' I'd take y in me arms, only that I might spoil the beauty, and it is yer own, oh, God bless the foine lady! What will yer father say whin he sees his little gurrl turned out to be such a purty lady? Och, but won't they be surprised whin ye go to church on Sunday!'

"Then the good woman came to thank me with tears streaming down her cheeks, and she seemed so happy, that I have felt happier myself; only that it brings to me the thought of how many such chances I have missed, how many I could have made happier when I had plenty of everything, but for want of thought, or lack of heart, I allowed the many opportunities to slip by, and out of my reach."

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

A SLAVE GIRL'S LETTER.

An effort is being made by the London "Christian" to raise funds for the purchase of a Malagasy slave woman who has been educated in the London Missionary Society's schools in Madagascar. The amount required is, doubtless, by this time all subscribed. That the girl will appreciate her emancipation is evident from the following letter which she sent recently to a lady in England, who sent her a present of some clothing. It was translated and forwarded by Mrs. J. Peill, the wife of a missionary in Madagascar:

"MY DEAR FRIEND:—I thank you very much for your very kind present, and it is just to express my gratitude that I send you this letter; and not mine alone, but also the grateful thanks of my mother, my brother, and my husband for your kindness; and as you have been such a friend to me, I think you may like to hear a little about me and mine.

"My father died on April 24, 1890, but my mother is still living. I was born in the year 1874, but I don't know in what month. I and my brother were both sent to school in 1882 (after attending the girls' school of the London Missionary Society) for about eight or nine years. I became a teacher there for a short time. In 1890 my little son was born, and in August, 1893, my little girl. My two little children give me great joy, but the joy is mixed with pain as I think of their probable future. The desire of my heart is for my children to get an education; but we are all poor slaves, and such a thought is far from the mind of our owner. She says that if her slaves go to school, and learn to read and write, it will make them lazy and unfit for work.

"My brother and I were allowed to learn by the masters we used to belong to; but since we grew up there has been a division of property in the family, and I and my children have changed owners, and our new mistress is very different from the former one. My hope and desire was to be employed in work for the kingdom of God, but that is now quite impossible. My time and strength are now nearly all taken up with working in the rice swamps and plantations for my owner; and as for my children, they will be like other little slave children. The boys are sent out to mind sheep and cattle all day long, and the girls are taken into the mistress's house to wait on her, and follow her about wherever she goes, and that is what I fear will be the lot of my little ones when they are two or three years older. My husband is also a slave, and has to work hard for his master."

A GLAD DAY AT ANIWA.

One of the days of joy that comes somenes to the missionary to reward him for ars of toil and hardship is described in a ently published letter from Mrs Paton e wife of the veteran missionary of the w Hebrides The following is an extract
"To spend such a day as we did a few bbaths ago, when our little church of God Aniwa was formerly constituted, we felt be worth more than all the sacrifices concted with our isolated life We had a very od attendance, one hundred and eighty ing present, and an unusual solemnity d interest pervaded the church through t the whole service. As they stood up to swer the form of questions Mr. Paton put them before receiving baptism, you could arcely have conceived of a more intensely eresting group. Vasi, our eldest mem-r, must, we think, be near ninety; but ed and infirm as he is, he came every y to school with his spectacles on, and is e of Mr. Paton's best writers as well as aders. Our old chief Namakei was there, th his daughter Litsi. She is his only ild living, and is almost as great a com-rt to me as to her father. She was the st girl who came to live with us, and be g the eldest on our premises, she sets a od example to the others. Her devotion
Mr. Paton almost amounts to adolatry.
e seems as if she never could be grateful ough to him for being the means of her nversion. But the one I felt most interest was Namakei's sister, a very gentle and licate-looking woman. I knew what it
d cost her to profess her faith in Jesus, d her husband and son were even then ring and laughing at her.

The Autoharp and its Home Attractions.

E are firmly convinced that there is too great haste in everything these days. We rush from one thing to another in a fashion which atens the destruction of many of the finer feel- nobler ideals and quieter occupations. Our e life is being robbed of its charm by the ever- ng hurry to do something, see something, be body. There was a time when the evenings at he were quiet hours of reading and music, vocal instrumental. How rarely do we find households gathered around the piano or organ enjoying sh hours as these? And who can estimate the in- nce in character molding which these refining in- ces have had on the men and women of our day? somehow a spirit of feverish restlessness has ght in; our children have social or business en- gements away from the home circle almost every ning in the week, and even we, who have been ght up so differently, find ourselves running and there on one errand or another, often to neglect of the homes, which are the large an nt the safeguards of our land. But who shall of- remedy for the existing state of affairs? Can it prevented nay rather can it be stopped? Is not the t to do so somewhat like that of attempting to ar- the motion of a spinning, fly-wheel? Certainly ng arbitrary will be efficient. But can we offer a counter attraction in the home, music for ance? But it is at once objected, "it must me new thing to hold young people these ?" Very well, why not a new musical in- ment? 'But that means the mastering of and that's drudgery." Suppose it be one the tering of which is a pleasure instead of a , and suppose it be indeed easy to learn to ? Of course, it must be truly musical for young folks are too intelligent for us to offer anything which hasn't the artistic possi- ties in it.

t this juncture we do not hesitate to suggest Autoharp.

nd now to an introduction of this marvelous rument. To accurately describe it in a few ds we can do not better than to say that it a stringed instrument, like the Zither, in that contains the strings of the natural scale with rps and flats thrown in, increasing in num- in its better grades. Over these strings placed felted chord bars which are so con- cted as when pressed to mute certain notes. sweep of the strings with one of these chord rs depressed produces a musical chord. But s is a mechanical description. To say that Autoharp is a bewitching musical instrument to be well within bounds.

But let us see whether it fills the requirements a musical instrument which we have sug- sted would be necessary to be truly a home raction. In the first place it has the advan- ge of novelty: this goes without saying. Again will be found that the pressure of a chord bar d a sweep of the strings calls forth harmony. e drudgery of practice is reduced to a mini- m and no discord can be made. "No fool- g," as the children say, it is easy to play. is as nearly a royal road to music as can found, and there is a charm about the very ractice that will give the young people many a easant evening at home, while the fascination hich holds them will also lead them to do eir very best and become proficient perform- s, all, of course, because there is no drudgery out the practice. This alone would be of ad- ntage to one who has despaired of mastering her instruments because of the time it would ke.

It is indeed true that our young people cannot be oodwinked in reference to the question as to wheth- the instrument is indeed musical or not, and the ct is that the Autoharp charms them at once. here is ample testimony upon this point from the ighest musical authority. The World's Fair Com- issioners said that the musical possibilities of the utoharp were unlimited, and when Mr. Victor Herbert was looking around for a special attraction r the concert tour of Gilmore's famous band, of which he is now the leader, he chose as a chief feature, Mr. Aldis J. Gery, Autoharp Soloist. This in itself is certainly convincing.

To characterize the tones of the Autoharp is very difficult for they may be either soft, pure and sweet, or strong, resonant and noble, and indeed the Autoharp needs to be heard to be appreciated. It is not the young people only who easily become enthusiastic over the Autoharp, for Auld Land Syne comes as easily to grandpa as does Daisy Bell to the school-girl, and the instrument is equally sympathetic to the touch of both. Indeed, an Autoharp Club at home is the simplest of all projects, for in the first place it can be participated in by the entire family, no matter how slight their musical attainments nor how dull their musical ear, and again the cost of a full set of Autoharps can be made scarcely more than that of one of the other well known instruments.

The reason why a person who has no musical ear can become a proficient Autoharp player, is chiefly because of the new system of musical notation which the manufacturers call, figure music. All the popular airs and sacred songs are arranged in this notation, and it is so simple as to be quickly mastered. The one fact that at least a half million people have bought Autoharps and are playing them without one hour's instruction from a teacher, is proof enough that the instrument is easy to play. However, no one need conclude that when he, or she, has learned to play an accompaniment, a march or a waltz, he has reached the limit of his possibility on the Autoharp, for on the more extensive styles it is possible to play all the classical music, and no one has yet discovered the limit of the Autoharp, which does not also bound the possibilities of any other one instrument. If you have a piano or organ or other instrument, you will find that the Autoharp chimes in beautifully with it.

All that has been said in reference to the Autoharp for the home, is quite as applicable to this instrument for social gatherings. It is so comfortably portable as to render it especially attractive. Gatherings of young people for fun and frolic will soon be very incomplete without the Autoharp. For sleigh rides in winter and for straw rides at any time of the year, the Autoharp will soon be found to be an indespensable companion.

But this brings us to the question of music for the vacation and here we can use no word more expressive than "bewitching" to describe the Autoharp and its associations. Imagine her eyes as he sits with autoharp in hand, quietly singing some bit of quaintness, and then say if you dare that the strings of the instrument did not play an important part in the denoument.

Be the scene out in a boat on some placid lake, beside the camp fire on some wooded slope, or where the deep diapason of the sea forms the accompaniment for the instrument's winning treble,—anywhere and everywhere where young or old congregate for rest and recreation, the Autoharp proves to be an additional attraction.

And finally, the fervor of religious gatherings is heightened by the sympathetic tones of this wonderful instrument. We have seen a lady thrill an audience with her earnest words and then, turning to the desk on which lay her Autoharp, fasten the impression made with a song easily and appropriately accompanied upon the instrument which seems to fill all niches. So we have come to the conclusion that there can be no exaggeration in saying that the Autoharp is never out of place or out of season.

Answering in advance some of the questions which may be asked, we would say that you can tune it easily. The strings won't break, scarcely one in a year and are not costly when they do, and the Autoharp itself will last a lifetime; the Autoharp music is cheap, only $1 per dozen sheets, and enough comes with each instrument to start one fairly on the road to proficiency and desire for more. The Autoharp music Catalogue contains four hundred selections.

Certain it is that the Autoharp is calculated to give universal satisfaction. But where, for one reason or another it does not prove to be altogether what you had expected and you suffer disappointment, we will gladly refund the money paid for it if it be returned in good condition.

EGYPT'S RUINED TEMPLES.

Some of the Impressive Sights to be Witnessed on a Journey Down the Nile —Karnak and Sakkara.

TRAVELERS in Egypt in these days find that the modern spirit of progress has invaded even the land of the Pharaohs, and that the journey down the Nile, formerly a serious undertaking, is now attended y few inconveniences and obstacles that ne does not encounter in an ordinary pleas- re trip. At the proper season, a "dahabi- eh," or Nile boat, may be engaged, and he journey made with a degree of omfort and satisfaction that ould have been impos- ible less than a score of ears ago. Long oyages are made n these boats, each lf which has a aptain, a crew, nd a cook, hose ombined fforts ake the xperience safe and elightful ne.

Sailing noothly etween alm- lin- l banks, lany of he his- oric pla- es can be iewed to dvant- ge from the eck, and stops an be made at ntervals, as de- ired, to permit a loser inspection of ome famous ruin or ome broken pyramid.

Among the many nota- le scenes to be visited, ew possess a greater in- erest than Sakkara, whose pyramids and ummy pits have a uni- ersal fascination for ex- lorers and Egyptolo- gists. Sakkara is near he ancient site of Memphis, and is quite eadily reached from Cai- o. It has been the scene f some of the greatest 'finds" of recent years. n the same vicinity s the Serapeum, or Temple of Apis (the sa- red bull), and the tombs onnected with it, in which a long line of these enerated animals are said o have been buried. This emple and the tombs were discovered by Mar- ette, a French savant, who spent two years in he locality conducting is researches. Upward f thirty immense stone offins, or sarcophagi, were unearthed in a re- markably good state of preservation. They are of elaborate workmanship, and fur- nish evidence of a prodigious expenditure of time and money; but while the result of the workman's labors are still almost per- fect, the god he worshipped has crumbled to dust and disappeared.

There is a group of pyramids, or "mas- tabas," near Sakkara, one of the most re- markable being the so-called "Stepped Pyr- amid," which is classed as belonging to the period of earliest Egyptian architecture, the larger and more perfect structures evidently being of later date, reared at a time when the nation had reached an advanced stage in pyramid-building. It is constructed of brick in six layers, each diminishing in height as it rises; the core of the whole being rubble, but covered and protected on all sides by a thick coating of roughly-hewn limestone. In the rock beneath is a granite-paved chamber, which originally contined a sarcophagus. A tradition asserts that the Children of Israel toiled in building this pyramid.

Besides this, there are in the same locality eleven lesser pyramids, one of which, at least, has been accepted as a royal sarcophagus. The Sakkara structures, which are believed to divide with the pyramids of Meydoun the distinction of being the oldest sepulchral edifices known, are claimed by some investigators to be "false pyramids," a term applied to a certain class of monumental ruins. On the eastern bank of the river, about a mile below Luxor (the ancient Thebes) are the famous ruins of Karnak, whose temples, pillars and pyramids greet the eye of the traveler long before his "dahabiyeh" reaches the place. The great temple of Karnak is one of the wonders of the world. Luxor's population lives largely on the gratuities given by sight-seeing strangers who visit the palaces of Karnak, and who buy liberally of the curios sold by the enterprising venders of such wares. On shore, Karnak is approached by an avenue six thousand feet long, and which must have once been magnificent. Of the hundreds of sphinxes that once lined it on either side, only a few broken figures remain. There are six propylæ or gateways, each consisting of two enormous towers, some carved with hieroglyphics, and spanned on top by a mass of stone that would almost defy modern engineering to uplift and set in place. Our illustration affords a glimpse of some of the formidable ruins of this wonderful city of a forgotten age. Within the walls, there are found everywhere the visible evidences of what was probably the most magnificent architecture the world ever saw. Towers 140 feet high, temples nearly 1200 feet long, walls twenty-five feet thick, and one great obelisk, ninety-two feet high and eight feet square at the base. No pen can adequately describe the artistic splendors of the great hall of the principal temple, whose two rows of gigantic but exquisitely graceful pillars still stand in testimony of the genius of the people that reared them. Those vast buildings, as their sculptures and inscriptions indicate, were the work of many kings and doubtless of several centuries. Tradition declares the temple to be 4000 years old, and that Noah visited it after the Flood. It was old when Moses led captive Israel out of Egypt, and was a ruin when Christ came to earth. It is older than any history now in human hands. From Egyptian temple and pyramid alike, later ages have learned much concerning the religious beliefs of those who built them. Sepulchral in character and design, the pyramids alone may be regarded as evidence of the belief, even in those early times, in the immortality of the soul and its ultimate reunion with the body. The dead were embalmed in order that the body might be preserved from decay, and to further secure it against the ravages of time, the wasting influence of the elements, or the hands of the despoiler, it was placed in a rock-cut tomb in a recess deep within the heart of the pyramid, and all access to it securely and forever closed, and even the passages blocked. The pyramid itself was the type of the highest form of durability known to the human mind, and was intended to last until the sealed bodies within should in the fullness of time be summoned by the divine powers to reunite with the disembodied spirit.

In Nubia, and all along the Nile Valley from Assouan to Khartoum, are found ancient mosques and temples, all more or less dilapidated, yet sufficiently preserved to be serviceable as a resting-place for travelers and a halt where the devout may worship. An "imam" at the entrance guards against any indignity being offered to the sacred place. In mosques such as that shown in the photograph on this page, a variety of races is sometimes to be found among the worshipers, including Arabs, blacks, tawny Egyptians and Syrian merchants who halt with their camel trains to pray and rest awhile. Like an oasis in the desert, it is a general halting-place; and there is usually a khan at hand with sufficient accommodations for travelers. In recent years a government surveying expedition from Cairo went over much of this remote Egyptian territory and it has now a line of telegraph connecting it with the military posts on the Lower Nile. The whole territory offers a rich and inviting field for Bible investigators and students of history.

THE GATES OF HEAVEN.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., preached last Sunday on the Text: Rev. 21: 13, "On the East three gates; on the North three gates; on the South three gates; on the West three gates."

THE Cashmere Gate of Delhi where converged a heroism that makes one's nerves tingle, the Lucknow Gate still dented and scarred with Sepoy bombardment, the Madeline Gate with its emblazonry in bronze, the hundred gates of Thebes the wonder of centuries, all go out of sight before the Gates of my text.

Our subject speaks of a great metropolis, the existence of which many have doubted. Standing on the wharf and looking off upon the harbor, and seeing the merchantmen coming up the bay, the flags of foreign nations streaming from the top-gallants, you immediately make up your mind that those vessels come from foreign ports, and you say: "That is from Hamburg, and that is from Marseilles, and that is from Southampton, and that is from Havana," and your supposition is accurate. But from the city of which I am now speaking no weather-beaten merchantmen or frigates with scarred bulkhead have ever come. There has been a vast emigration into that city, but no emigration from it—so far as our natural vision can descry. "There is no such city," says the undevout astronomer, "I have stood in high towers with a mighty telescope, and have swept the heavens, and I have seen spots on the sun and caverns in the moon; but no towers have ever risen on my vision, no palaces, no temples, no shining streets, no massive wall. There is no such city." Even very good people tell me that heaven is not a material organism, but a grand spiritual fact, and that the Bible descriptions of it are in all cases to be taken figuratively. I bring in reply to this what Christ said, and he ought to know: "I go to prepare"—not a theory, not a principle, not a sentiment; but "I go to prepare a place for you." The resurrected body implies this. If my foot is to be re-formed from the dust, it must have something to tread on. If my hand is to be reconstructed, it must have something to handle. If my eye, having gone out in death, is to be rekindled, I must have something to gaze on. Your adverse theory seems to imply that the resurrected body is to be hung on nothing, or to walk in air, or to float amid the intangibles. You may say if there be material organisms, then a soul in heaven will be cramped and hindered in its enjoyments; but I answer: Did not Adam and Eve have plenty of room in the garden of Eden? Although only a few miles would have described the circumference of that place, they had ample room. And do you not suppose that God, in the immensities, can build a place large enough to give the whole race room, even though there be material organisms?

Herschel looked into the heavens. As a Swiss guide puts his Alpine stock between the glaciers and crosses over from crag to crag, so Herschel planted his telescope between the worlds and glided from star to star, until he could announce to us that we live in a part of the universe but sparsely strewn with worlds; and he peers out into immensity until he finds a region no larger than our solar system in which there are fifty thousand worlds moving. And Professor Lang says that, by a philosophic reasoning, there must be somewhere a world where there is no darkness, but everlasting sunshine; so that I do not know but that it is simply because we have no telescope powerful enough that we cannot see into the land where there is no darkness at all, and catch a glimpse of the burnished pinnacles. As a conquering army marching on to take a city, comes at nightfall to the crest of a mountain from which, in the midst of the landscape, they see the castles they are to capture, and rein in their war chargers, and halt to take a good look before they pitch their tents for the night: so now, coming as we do on this mountain-top of prospect, I command this regiment of God to rein in their thoughts and halt, and before they pitch their tents for the night take one good, long look at the gates of the great city. "On the east three gates; on the north three gates; on the south three gates; and on the west three gates.

In the first place I want you to examine the architecture of those gates. Proprietors of large estates are very apt to have an ornamented gateway. Sometimes they spring an arch of masonry, the posts of the gate flanked with lions in statuary; the bronze gate a representation of intertwining foliage, bird-haunted, until the hand of architectural genius drops exhausted, all its life frozen into the stone. Gates of wood, and iron, and stone guarded nearly all the old cities. Moslems have inscribed upon their gateways inscriptions from the Koran of the Mohammedan. There have been a great many fine gateways, but Christ sets his hand to the work, and for the upper city swung a gate such as no eye ever gazed on, untouched of inspiration. With the nail of his own Cross he cut into its wonderful traceries stories of past suffering and of gladness to come. There is no wood, or stone, or bronze in that gate, but from top to base, and from side to side, it is all of pearl. Not one piece picked up from Ceylon banks and another piece from the Persian Gulf, and another from the Island of Margarette; but one solid pearl picked up from the beach of everlasting light by heavenly hands, and hoisted and swung amid the shouting of angels. The glories of alabaster vase and porphyry pillar fade out before this gateway. It puts out the spark of feldspar and diamond. You know how one little precious stone on your finger will flash under the gaslight. But O! the brightness when the great gate of heaven swings, struck through and dripping with the light of eternal noonday.

Julius Cæsar paid a hundred and twenty-five thousand crowns for one pearl. The Government of Portugal boasted of having a pearl larger than a pear. Cleopatra and Philip II. dazzled the world's vision with precious stones. But gather all these together and lift them, and add to them all the wealth of the pearl fisheries and set them in the panel of one door, and it does not equal this magnificent gateway. An Almighty hand hewed this, swung this, polished this. Against this gateway, on the one side, dash all the splendors of earthly beauty. Against this gate on the other side beat the surges of eternal glory. O! the gate! the gate! It strikes an infinite charm through everyone that passes it. One step this side of the gate and we are paupers. One step the other side of the gate and we are kings. The pilgrim of earth going through sees in the one huge pearl all his earthly tears in crystal. O! gate of light! gate of pearl! gate of heaven! For our weary souls at last swing open.

> When shall these eyes thy heaven-built walls
> And pearly gates behold:
> Thy bulwarks with salvation strong,
> And streets of shining gold?

O! heaven is not a dull place. Heaven is not a contracted place. Heaven is not a stupid place. "I saw the twelve gates, and they were twelve pearls."

In the second place I want you to count the number of those gates. Imperial parks and lordly manors are apt to have one expensive gateway, and the others are ordinary; but look around at these entrances to heaven, and count them. One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven, twelve. Hear it all the earth and all the heavens. Twelve gates!

I admit this is rather hard on sharp sectarianisms! If a Presbyterian is bigoted, he brings his Westminster Assembly Catechism, and he makes a gateway out of that, and he says to the world: "You go through there or stay out." If a member of the Reformed Church is bigoted, he makes a gate out of the Heidelberg Catechism, and he says: "You go through there or stay out." If a Methodist is bigoted, he plants two posts, and he says: "Now you crowd in between those two posts or stay out." Or perhaps an Episcopalian may say: "Here is is a liturgy out of which I mean to make a gate; go through it or stay out." Or a Baptist may say: "Here is a water-gate; you go through that or you must stay out." And so in all our churches and in all our denominations there are men who make one gate for themselves, and then demand that the whole world go through it. I abhor this contractedness in religious views. Oh! small-souled man, when did God give you the contract for making gates? I tell you plainly I will not go in that gate. I will go in at anyone of the twelve gates I choose. Here is a man who says, "I can more easily and more closely approach God through a prayer-book." I say, "My brother, then use the prayer-book." Here is a man who says, "I believe there is only one mode of baptism, and that is immersion." Then I say, "Let me plunge you." Anyhow, I say, away with the gate of rough panel and rotten posts and rusted latch, when there are twelve gates and they are twelve pearls.

The fact is, that a great many of the churches in this day are being doctrined to death. They have been trying to find out all about God's decrees, and they want to know who are elected to be saved and who are reprobated to be damned, and they are keeping on discussing that subject when there are millions of souls who need to have the truth put straight at them. They sit counting the number of teeth in the jawbone with which Samson slew the Philistines. They sit on the beach and see a vessel going to pieces in the offing, and instead of getting into a boat, and pulling away for the wreck, they sit discussing the different styles of oarlocks. God intended us to know some things, and intended us not to know others. I have heard scores of sermons explanatory of God's decrees, but came away more perplexed than when I went. The only result of such discussion is a great fog. Here are two truths which are to conquer the world: Man, a sinner—Christ, a Saviour. Any man who adopts those two theories in his religious belief shall have my right hand in warm grip of Christian brotherhood.

A man comes down to a river in time of freshet. He wants to get across. He has to swim. What does he do? The first thing is to put off his heavy apparel, and drop everything he has in his hands. He must go empty-handed if he is going to the other bank. And I tell you when we have come down to the river of death, and find it swift and raging, we will have to put off all our sectarianism and lay down all our cumbrous creed, and empty-handed put out for the other shore. "What," say you, "would you resolve all the Christian Church into one kind of church? Would you make all Christendom worship in the same way, by the same forms?" Oh, no You might as well decide that all people shall eat the same kind of food without reference to appetite, or wear the same kind of apparel without reference to the shape of their body. Your ancestry, your temperament, your surroundings, will decide whether you go to this or that church, and adopt this or that church polity. One church will best get one man to heaven, and another church another man. I do not care which one of the gates you go through, if you only go through one of the twelve gates that Jesus lifted.

Well now I see all the redeemed of earth coming up toward heaven. Do you think they will all get in? Yes. Gate the first the Moravians come up; they believed in the Lord Jesus; they pass through. Gate the second: the Quakers come up; they have received the inward light; they have trusted in the Lord; they pass through Gate the third: the Lutherans come up they had the same grace that made Luther what he was, and they pass through. Gate the fourth: the Baptists pass through Gate the fifth: the Free-will Baptists pass through. Gate the sixth: the Reformed Church passes through. Gate the seventh the Congregationalists pass through. Gate the eighth: the Episcopalian Church passes through. Gate the ninth: the Methodists pass through. Gate the tenth: the Sabbatarians pass through. Gate the eleventh: the Church of the Disciples pass through. Gate the twelfth: the Presbyterians pass through. But there are a great host of other denominations who must come in, and great multitudes who connect themselves with no visible church, but have the power of godliness in their heart and showed it in their life. Where is their gate? Will you shut all the remaining host out of the city? No. They may come in at one gate. Hosts of God, if you cannot get admission through any other entrance, come in at the twelfth gate. Now they min before the throne.

Looking up at the one hundred and forty and four thousand, you cannot tell which gate they came in. One Lord. One faith. One baptism. One glassy sea. One doxology. One triumph. One heaven. "Why, Luther, how did you get in? I came through the third gate." "Cranmer how did you get in?" "I came through the eighth gate." "Adoniram Judson, how did you get through?" "I came through the fourth gate." "Hugh McKail, martyr, how did you get through?" "I came through the twelfth gate." Glory to God! twelve gates, but one heaven.

In the third place, notice the points of the compass toward which these gates look. They are not on one side, or on two sides, or on three sides, but on four sides. There is no fancy of mine but a distinct announcement. On the north, three gates, on the south, three gates, on the east, three gates, on the west, three gates. What does that mean? Why it means that all nationalities are included, and it does not make any difference from what quarter of the earth a man comes up; if his heart is right, there is a gate open before him. On the north three gates. That means mercy for Scotland, and Siberia, and Norway and Sweden. On the south, three gates. That means pardon for Hindostan, and Algeria and Ethiopia. On the east, three gates. That means salvation for China, and Japan, and Borneo. On the west, three gates. That means redemption for America. It does not make any difference how dark-skinned or how pale-faced men may be.

the will find a gate right before them. Those plucked bananas under a tropical sun. These shot across Russian snows behind reindeer. From Mexican plateau, from Roman Campania, from Chinese tea-fields, from Holland dyke, from Scotch highlands, they come, they come. Heaven is not a monopoly for a few precious souls. It is not a Windsor Castle, built only for royal families. It is not a small town with small population, but John saw it, and he noticed that an angel was measuring it, and he measured it this way, and then he measured it that way, and whichever way he measured it, it was fifteen hundred miles; so that Babylon and Tyre and Nineveh and St. Petersburg, and Canton, and Pekin and Paris, and London and New York, and all the dead cities of the past and all the living cities of the present, added together would not equal the census of the great metropolis.

Walking along a street, you can, by the colour of the dress, or of the face, guess where a man comes from. You say: "That is a Frenchman; that is a Norwegian; that is an American." But the gates that gather in the righteous will bring them in irrespective of nationality. Foreigners sometimes get homesick. Some of the tenderest and most pathetic stories have been told of those who left their native clime, and longed for it until they died. But the Swiss, going to the high residence of heaven, will not long any more for the Alps, standing amid the eternal hills. The Russian will not long any more for the luxuriant harvest-field he left, now that he hears the harvest and the rattle of the harvests of everlasting light. The royal ones from earth will no long to go back again to the earthly court now that they stand in the palaces of the sun. Those who once lived among the groves of spice and oranges will not long to return now that they stand under the trees of life that bear twelve manner of fruit.

While I speak an ever-increasing throng is pouring through the gates. They are going up from Senegambia, from Patagonia, from Madras, from Hong Kong. "What?" you say, "Do you introduce all the heathen into glory?" I tell you that fact is that a majority of the people in those climes die in infancy, and the infants all go straight into eternal life, and so the vast majority of those who die in China and India, the vast majority of those who die in Africa, go straight into the skies—they die in infancy. One hundred and sixty generations have been born since the world was created, and so I estimate that there must be fifteen thousand million children in glory. If at a concert ten thousand children sing, your soul is tortured within you. O! the transport when fifteen thousand million little ones stand up in white before the throne of God, their chanting drowning out all the stupendous harmonies of Dusseldorf, and Leipsic. Pour in through the twelve gates, O ye redeemed! banner lifted, rank after rank, saved battalion after saved battalion, until all the city of God shall hear the tramp, tramp. Crowd all the twelve gates. Room yet. Room on the thrones. Room in the mansions. Room on the river bank. Let the trumpet of invitation be sounded until all earth's mountains hear the shrill blast and the glens echo it. Let missionaries tell it in pagoda and colporteurs sound across the Western prairies. Shout it to the Laplander on his swift sled; halloo it to the Bedouin careering across the desert. News! News! A glorious heaven and twelve gates to get into it! Hear it! O you thin-blooded nations of eternal winter—on the north, three gates. Hear it! O you bronzed inhabitants panting under equatorial heats—on the south, three gates.

But I notice when John saw these gates they were open—wide open. They will not always be so. After awhile heaven will have gathered up all its intended population, and the children of God will have come home. Every crown taken. Every harp struck. Every throne mounted. All the glories of the universe harvested in the great garner. And heaven being made up, of course the gates will be shut. Austria in, and the first gate shut. Russia in, and the second gate shut. Italy in, and the third gate shut. Egypt in, and the fourth gate shut. Spain in, and the fifth gate shut. France in, and the sixth gate shut. England in, and the seventh gate shut. Norway in, and the eighth gate shut. Switzerland in, and the ninth gate shut. Hindostan in, and the tenth gate shut. Siberia in, and the eleventh gate shut. All the gates are closed but one. Now, let America go in with all the islands of the sea and all the other nations that have called on God. The captives all freed. The harvests all gathered. The nations all saved. The flashing splendor of this last pearl begins to move on its hinges. Let two mighty angels put their shoulders to the gate and heave it to with silvery clang. It is done! It thunders. The twelfth gate shut!

Once more I want to show you the gate-keepers. There is one angel at each one of those gates. You say that is right. Of course it is. You know that no earthly palace, or castle, or fortress would be safe without a sentry pacing up and down by night and by day; and if there were no defences before heaven, and the doors set wide open with no one to guard them, all the vicious of earth would go up after awhile, and all the abandoned of hell would go up after awhile, and heaven, instead of being a world of light, and joy, and peace, and blessedness, would be a world of darkness and horror. So I am glad to tell you that while these twelve gates stand open to let a great multitude in, there are twelve angels to keep some people out. Robespierre cannot go through there, nor Hildebrand, nor Nero, nor any of the debauched of earth who have not repented of their wickedness. If one of those nefarious men who despised God should come to the gate, one of the keepers would put his hand on his shoulder and push him into outer darkness. There is no place in that land for thieves, and liars, and whoremongers, and defrauders, and all those who disgraced their race and fought against their God. If a miser should get in there, he would pull up the golden pavement. If a house-burner should get in there, he would set fire to the mansion. If a libertine should get in there, he would whisper his abominations standing on the white coral of the sea-beach. Only those who are blood-washed and prayer-lipped will get through. O, my brother, if you should at last come up to one of the gates and try to get through, and you had not a pass written written by the crushed hand of the Son of God, the gate-keeper would with one glance wither you forever.

There will be a password at the gate of heaven. Do you know what that password is? Here comes a crowd of souls up to the gate, and they say: "Let me in, let me in. I was very useful on earth. I endowed colleges, I built churches, and was famous for my charities; and having done so many wonderful things for the world, now I come up to get my reward." A voice from within says: "I never knew you." Another great crowd comes up, and they try to get through. They say: "We were highly honorable on earth, and the world bowed very lowly before us. We were honored on earth, and now we come to get our honors in heaven:" and a voice from within says: "I never knew you." Another crowd advances, and says: "We were very moral people on earth, very moral indeed, and we come up to get appropriate recognition." A voice answers: "I never knew you."

After awhile I see another throng approach the gate, and one seems to be spokesman for all the rest, although their voices ever and anon cry, "Amen! amen!" This one stands at the gate and says: "Let me in. I was a wanderer from God. I deserved to die. I have come up to this place, not because I deserve it, but because I have heard that there is a saving power in the blood of Jesus." The gate-keeper says: "That is the password, 'Jesus! Jesus!'" and they go in, and surround the throne, and the cry is: "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive blessing, and riches, and honor, and glory, and power, world without end!"

I stand here, this hour, to invite you into anyone of the twelve gates. I tell you now that unless your heart is changed by the grace of God, you cannot get in. I do not care where you come from, or who your father was, or who your mother was, or what your brilliant surroundings—unless you repent of your sin and take Christ for your divine Saviour, you cannot get in. Are you willing, then, this moment, just where you are, to kneel down and cry to the Lord Almighty for his deliverance?

You want to get in, do you not? O, you have some good friends there. This last year there was some one who went out from your home into that blessed place. They did not have any trouble getting through the gates, did they? No, they knew the password, and, coming up, they said "Jesus!" and the cry was: "Lift up your heads, ye everlasting gates, and let them come in." O, when heaven is all done, and the troops of God shout the castle taken, how grand it will be if you and I are among them. Blessed are all they who enter in through the gates into the city.

"THE PASSION" IN SCULPTURE.

Explorations in the Catacombs at Rome have brought to light many interesting and important facts connected with the early history of the Christian Church. In those vast subterranean burial-places, whose winding galleries are hundreds of miles in total extent, are many remarkable sculptures, paintings and inscriptions, symbolical and historical. All are marked for their entire opposition to the pagan spirit which prevailed in Rome during the first few centuries after Christ, and also for their entire freedom from the later errors of the Romish Church. One of the most remarkable of these sculptures is shown in the illustration on this page, representing leading events in "the Passion." On the right is a rude portrayal of "the Supper," and on the adjoining panel, the "Arrest of the Saviour." The centre shows the Constantinian monogram of Christ, which is found on many of the older Christian tombs and monuments in the Catacombs and elsewhere. In the next panel a soldier is seen placing a crown of thorns on the brow of Jesus, and the last is the Saviour on the way to Calvary with Simon the Cyrenian before him, bearing the Cross.

WATCHFULNESS.

S. S. Lesson for April 21. Matt. 24: 42-51. Golden Text Mark 13:33. By Mrs. Baxter.

OUR Lord's exhortation to watch is grounded on his own statement, "ye know not on what day your Lord cometh" (Matt. 24: 42). Therefore we cannot conclude that he is speaking of the coming mentioned in verses 21-31, which speak of a coming of the Lord preceded by the "great tribulation, such as hath not been from the beginning of the world until now, no nor ever shall be." They speak of a general excitement about his coming; men saying: "Here is Cnrist," or "Here:" of the rise of false Christs and false prophets which "shall show great signs and wonders," concluding with the darkening of the sun and moon, the falling of the stars from heaven, and the shaking of the powers of the heavens.

The day is drawing nigh. While those who do not wait for him, but who are looking for the conversion of the world to take place before he comes, or while others are looking for the Gospel to be preached in all nations for a witness before he comes, instead of before "the end" (Matt. 24: 14), of which his coming for his waiting ones is only precursory—there are those in all lands who wait for him. We have heard of Chinese converts, old women converted at the age of seventy, who watch and wait for him. Many in heathen lands on whom the Sun of Righteousness has arisen, have begun, like Paul, to love his appearing; and in all parts of the world a few in all the churches, are really and practically waiting and watching for their Lord. "Thy people are free will offerings in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness: from the womb of the morning, thy youth are to thee as the dew." (Ps. 110: 3 R.V. margin.) Because the morning is there the dew falls; the dew does not make the morning, the morning brings the dew. Man cannot make the morning come, but the willing people freewill offerings in spirit, truly consecrated ones, are a sign of the morning, and proof that the dawn is at hand, that the day draweth nigh.

If the Lord did not come for those who wait for him until a time like this, it would have been more consistent had he bidden us look out for the things which must happen before he comes. But he preludes his exhortation to watch by likening the time to the days of Noah, when things were going on as usual, "until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and the flood came and took them all away; so shall the coming of the Son of Man be. Then shall two men be in the field at their ordinary labor, which has not been interrupted by the utter disorganization of everything in the time of the great tribulation—one is taken and one is left; two women shall be grinding at the mill; one is taken and one is left. "Watch therefore" (verses 37-43, R. V.). And again: "Take ye heed, watch and pray, for ye know not when the time is" (Mark 13: 33). Those who do not watch shall be taken unawares they have not loved the Lord's appearing" (II. Tim. 4: 3). While they say: "Peace and safety, sudden destruction shall come upon them unawares, and they shall not escape" (I. Thes. 5: 2).

What is it then to lead a life of watchfulness? Away in central India, near the hills, where wild animals range at large, there may be seen, here and there, in a tree, a kind of stage which looks like a large bird's nest. It is really a few planks of wood, or [illegible] often a few bamboo sticks, which form a seat or a small platform from which a man or woman, whose business it is to watch, can survey the country round for some miles. The watcher is expected to give alarm if the wild animals are likely to do damage at night among the young cattle, or to the little homesteads; they also scare away the birds from their fields of corn during the day. The watcher is awake when other men sleep; he sees what other men cannot see; it is his vocation to keep his eyes open. In his exalted position he cannot enter into conversation with those who pass along the roads; he must be still until the moment comes to give the alarm; his watch is his vocation; he must not leave his post.

If we are the Lord's watchmen, we, too, are on duty; we must let nothing distract us. Like the man at the wheel guiding one of our large steamships, whom no passenger may speak to; like the sentinel on duty, so is he who is really looking for his Lord. He is "on service;" he with the affairs of this life, that he may please him who enrolled him as a soldier. (II.Tim. 2: 4). He does his daily work, perhaps more conscientiously than others, but he does it with his eve, not on his doing, or on its earthly result, but on his coming Lord. He knows "the time is shortened;" and so if he buys it is as though he possessed not, he is not entangled in his buying, or in his selling, he buys as he would buy if he knew that Christ would come in the midst of the transaction. He may marry, but he does not let his marriage entangle him: his home life is subservient to his watch for his Lord. If he weeps, he is not entangled in his sorrow; he weeps as though he wept not, for the Lord may come in the midst, and change all the circumstances. If he rejoices, whether over souls saved, or over success in any other undertaking; whether in his children or whatsoever, his joy, as well as his sorrow, is tempered by the watching for his Lord. He remains free and disentangled; neither carried away by joy nor depressed by sorrow, but using this world as not using it to the full. (1. Cor. 7: 29-31, R.V. margin) "for the fashion of this world passeth away."

A watcher looks beyond the things seen and temporal (II. Cor. 4: 17, 18); his eyes are open to see things from God's standpoint; he cannot despair about anything, for he has learned to will with God, and he can trust his God to bring about his own will. But he is truly a pilgrim and a stranger down here. Nothing earthly is indispensable to him, but he cannot live out of the presence of God, he lives looking unto Jesus. He can afford to be humbled, to be despised, to be neglected, but he cannot afford to be distracted from his watch; his occupation with his Lord and his Word in the present, that he may be ready for him when he comes in the future.

The Apostle Paul, mighty worker as he was, never let his work entangle him from his watch.

"One thing I do,"

meant with him pressing toward the mark for the prize, which his almost last words show to be connected with the Lord's appearing. He knew deep sorrow in the care of all the churches, but he never let the sorrow distract him from his watch. He was ready at any moment, and says of himself and his fellow watchers in Thessalonica: "Let us since we are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love, and for a helmet the hope of salvation. For God appointed us, not unto wrath, but to the obtaining of salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him." (1.Thess. 8: 9.) And, in the same spirit, he writes to the Corinthians, when speaking of the transfiguration which shall take place when Jesus comes, and mortality is swallowed up of life. "We are of good courage . . . and willing rather to be absent from the body and present or at home with the Lord. Wherefore we make it our aim, whether at home or absent to be well pleasing unto him." (IICor. 5: 5; R.V.)

In such a spirit a man is ready whenever "the Lord of the house cometh, whether at even or midnight, or at cock-crowing or in the morning." (Mark 13: 35.) And then he shows how the faithful wise, truly watchful servant will be set over his house to give food in due season. Such a servant will be blest and not taken unawares. But he who is not right in his relations with his fellow-servants, and who shall say, in his heart "My Lord tarrieth," shall be taken by surprise; his Lord will come in a day when he expecteth not, and in an hour when he knoweth not; and he will severely scourge him, and give him his part with the hypocrites. (Matt. 24: 44-51; R.V. marg.)

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

WHILE leaving the International Committee full liberty in the choice of lessons in general, the Sunday School Convention made one stipulation, which was, that at regular intervals

"WHEN THEY SHALL SAY, 'PEACE AND SAFETY'——."

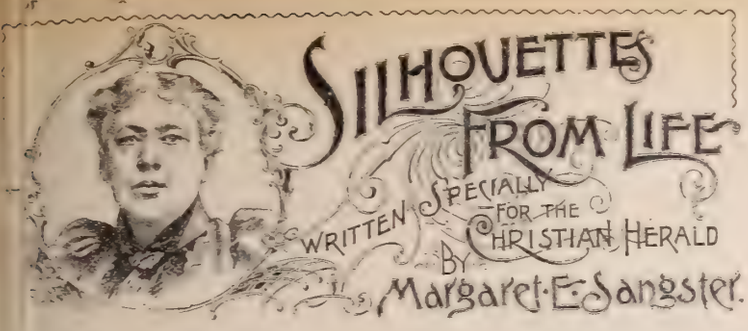
there should be a Temperance lesson. The Committee has endeavored to combine the plan of the year with the injunction of the Convention, by making this discourse of our Lord the text of a Temperance Lesson. The forty-ninth verse will serve this purpose, although the watchfulness enjoined by our Lord, did not apply exclusively, or even primarily, to Temperance, as we use the word. The disciples had just been startled by Christ's prediction that the Temple would be destroyed. To them, with their narrow, self-centred Judaism, the destruction of the Temple meant the destruction of religion, the very end of the world. Christ removes that notion at the outset. The end, he says, is not yet. All that upheaval and destruction would occur and the world would go on undisturbed; there would be wars and persecutions and all kinds of troubles and a great deal would occur before the end came. Even the Jewish people would survive the loss of the Temple and the Temple services; the race (or generation) would not pass away, nor be absorbed, until all the predictions of the universal collapse were fulfilled. As to his own coming in glory, he could give them no indication as to time. He frankly said he did not know when it would be. And then, setting aside all these questions springing from curiosity, he gives the talk one of those sudden, practical turns which were characteristic of his conversation. Instead of speculating about times and dates, let them go about their duty. They were to live so that whenever he came, they would not be ashamed, or afraid to meet him. By a series of parables, he intimated that the world would grow careless and even the church would lose sight of his coming. People would be occupied with ordinary pursuits, a part of the church, represented by the five virgins, would cease to watch, would take a rest and a sleep. Their lamps, which should have given light to the world, lighting sinners to him, would go out, and there would be comparatively few who would not [illegible] taken by surprise. Two special warni[illegible] he gave his own people; one was aga[illegible] unkindness to their brethren (smiting t[illegible] fellow-servants) and the other against [illegible] indulgence, (eating and drinking with [illegible] drunken.) The language Christ [illegible] clearly proves that he expected to com[illegible] the world again. The disciples evide[illegible] placed that construction on his words, [illegible] even after Pentecost, when they had t[illegible] adjust their ideas of his teaching, they [illegible] expected him to return. Peter, near [illegible] close of his life, in one of his Epistles [illegible] affirmed his belief, and explicitly wa[illegible] the church not to be lulled into heedless[illegible] by the fact that there might be no sig[illegible] his coming. The duty of the follow[illegible] Christ now, as in the preceding genera[illegible] is to be in readiness and not to grow [illegible] less, unsympathetic, or self-indulgent.

Watch therefore. Dr. Newman Hall [illegible] that a friend of his who is an expert m[illegible] tain-climber, was overtaken at night[illegible] a mountain ridge. The path behind [illegible] too perilous to be retraced safely in [illegible] darkness, and the way in front was st[illegible] by a projecting rock which he coul[illegible] scale at night. His only course w[illegible] wait where he was until morning. B[illegible] was on a slope ending in a sheer prec[illegible] One careless movement might [illegible] his destruction. As the dark[illegible] deepened he could not see his [illegible] ger, but was increasingly consci[illegible] of it. In the cold air and with t[illegible] miliarity of the situation that [illegible] as the hours passed, he grew [illegible] and more drowsy. What effor[illegible] made during those long hou[illegible] drive off sleep! How he stirre[illegible] mind to the necessity of unrem[illegible] vigilance! He kept vividly [illegible] his imagination the picture [illegible] sleeping and slipping to the ed[illegible] and over the precipice. That [illegible] knew the meaning of the ex[illegible] tion, "Watch therefore."

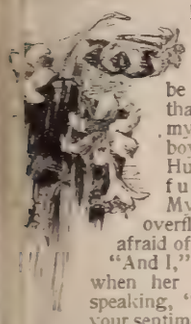
Who then is a faithful and [illegible] servant? The watching enjoi[illegible] not an attitude of idle waiting [illegible] lord in the parable did not wi[illegible] servant to stand at the door lo[illegible] out for him, but to be at his du[illegible] lady once said to John W[illegible] "Suppose you knew you were [illegible] at twelve o'clock to-morrow [illegible] how would you employ the int[illegible] ing time?" He replied: "Wh[illegible] as I intend to spend it now. I [illegible] preach this evening at Glo[illegible] and again to-morrow morning. [illegible] that I should ride to Tewke[illegible] preach in the afternoon; meet the s[illegible] in the evening, then repair to Friend [illegible] tin's; who expects to entertain me [illegible] verse and pray with the family as [illegible] retire to my room at ten o'clock, co[illegible] myself to my heavenly Father, lie d[illegible] rest and wake up in glory."

To give them meat in due season. [illegible] the most difficult things for a Chris[illegible] do is to seize the right opportunity to [illegible] to a soul and to say the right thing [illegible] Moody says that when he was sev[illegible] years of age he was in a Bible class [illegible] of the Boston churches. He had bee[illegible] only a few Sundays when the teache[illegible] to the shoe store in which he was e[illegible] ed. "He put his hand on my sho[illegible] says Mr. Moody, "and spoke to m[illegible] my soul. Seventeen years afterwar[illegible] speaking in Worcester and after the [illegible] ing a young man came. He said, "[illegible] heard my father speak of you ofte[illegible] thought I should like to know y[illegible] asked him who his father was and [illegible] plied 'Edward Kemble.' My old t[illegible] The thought crossed my mind, 'C[illegible] could do for his son what he did for [illegible] Mr. Moody labored with that youn[illegible] until he became a Christian.

Shall cut him asunder. Gurnal rela[illegible] in a critical period of a campaign, dis[illegible] reached the General in command [illegible] army which convinced him that the [illegible] was near at hand, but that it was i[illegible] ble to guess what would be the poi[illegible] tack. It was midnight and the saf[illegible] the army depended on the vigilance [illegible] sentinels. He set out immediately [illegible] they were doing their duty. The ve[illegible] post he came to was vacant and a few [illegible] away the sentinel was lying fast [illegible] He was so indignant at the man's [illegible] ence to the safety of his comrades [illegible] drew his sword and stabbed him [illegible] heart. "I found him dead asleep," [illegible] said, "and left him asleep in death!



An Easter of the Heart.



HAT do I want of another life? What has heaven to offer me? I could not be happier in heaven than I am here with my wife, my splendid boys, Ralph and Hugh, and my beautiful daughter, Ethel. My cup is full to the overflow. I am almost afraid of so much joy."

"And I," said Mrs. Elmore, when her husband ceased speaking, "can fully endorse your sentiments, only, if possible, more strongly. Never was there a home began to be so beautiful and happy as our dear home of ours."

"Children, Tom and Rachel," gentle interposed dear old Cousin Charity, who was paying them a visit, "I am sorry to see you so absorbed in this most perfect earthly life of yours. I fear there must be a stirring of unrest. God loves you too well to let you anchor your souls in this world. I do not like the feeling that 'we must suspect some danger near when we possess delight,' nor do I think that our Father is an arbitrary being who rejoices in shattering our human plans, but, my dears, I am very sure that your satisfaction is not right. It demands aspiration and growth. Don't be so wrapped up in this fair Eden. There are sweet fields beyond the swelling flood! Are you Christians!"

"Goodness, Cousin Charity, don't be so solemn," exclaimed Mrs. Elmore. "You make me shiver to hear you. There, see Ethel dancing down the walk. Isn't she a picture, with her brown curls flying, her cheeks like roses, and her feet that are light as wings? Look how her little dog, Top-fly, rushes after her. Oh! my sweet Ethel, as good as you are pretty; and my noble boys. I am of Tom's opinion."

One week passed. Word went through the village that diphtheria had broken out in the Elmore's, and that Ralph and Ethel were both very ill. Hugh had been sent away for safety.

Two weeks passed. There was crape on Mr. Elmore's door-bell, and a hurried private funeral a few hours after the dread malady had wrenched the life out of the brother and sister. Lovely and pleasant in their lives, in death they were not divided. Ethel first, then Ralph, but only an hour apart, the angel who steals over our thresholds and bears away our darlings, carried them both to the "sweet fields beyond the swelling flood."

When next the townspeople saw Mr. and Mrs. Elmore they observed that they would scarcely have known them. Age seemed suddenly to have fallen on them like a blight. Clothed in clinging crape from head to foot, bowed and white behind her veil, Mrs. Elmore dragged her feet as if they were fettered, and her husband, looking neither to right nor to left, passed his old acquaintances like one in a dream.

Every day, through wet or dry, heat or cold, Mrs. Elmore went to the cemetery. She spent hours at the children's graves, heaping flowers on them, weeping the hot tears of despairing grief. Meanwhile, she took no interest in her home. It was forlorn and neglected-looking, the parlor was kept closed, and Ethel's piano was locked, so that by no chance could any one play upon it. Stranger than this, both parents persisted in neglecting the child they had left. To see and hear them, you would have thought that the two who were gone had been angelic, and that poor Hugh was but a little, feeble changeling.

A sensitive little fellow, he felt this treatment acutely. Of course he had his own grief to bear. Few people give children credit for the suffering they undergo when their play-mates and brothers and sisters are taken away. Hugh, repulsed and coldly or perfunctorily kissed, would have fared badly now, but for old black Mammy Lucy, a colored friend of the children who took in washing, and lived in a little frame house in the street back of Mr. Elmore's avenue residence.

One day, when the crocuses were in bloom, and a rarely radiant spring day was shining, Hugh ran in with a handful of flowers and threw them in his mother's lap.

"See, Mamma," he said, "I picked them for you. Mamma, come out and walk with me won't you—its a beautiful day."

"Don't litter up the house, Hugh, by bringing me flowers, and don't speak of the day. The sunshine cannot get down into the gloomy graves where Ethel and Ralph are lying."

The child crept away to the kitchen, where Mammy Lucy who had just brought home a basket of freshly laundried clothing was taking a cup of tea. Soon he found himself in her motherly arms, and he sobbed out his troubles on her breast.

"Honey," she said, "Miss Ethel and brudder Ralphie, jest gone to sleep. Dey'll wake up one of dese days. Don't you grieb so. Your maw an' paw feel mighty bad now, but dey loves you, too, and all will come out all right. Yet, you must trust de Lord, who says, 'Suffer de little children to come unto me.'"

Days passed and Good Friday dawned. From the paralysis of their first sorrow the parents had begun to arouse themselves. "And Tom," said Rachel, "we have been so wretched, we have not been kind to Hugh. But it has hurt me so, to see him playing around, as though nothing had happened."

"Well, dear," answered the husband, "a child's feelings are not deep. I hardly think Hugh has noticed any lack. Where is the little fellow, I wonder."

"Somewhere out of doors," said Mrs. Elmore, and they passed to other things.

An hour afterward, the mother took her sad walk to her children's graves. The path to her plot, from the cemetery gate, was a winding one, and steep. As the mother climbed it, she became aware that somebody was before her, and when she reached the place, she stood still in sheer amazement.

There, kneeling beside the small deep graves which held the little ones, was a slight, golden-haired boy, pale and small, his tiny hands clasped, his blue eyes looking up. He was praying, and this is what the mother heard him say:

"Oh! dear Lord Jesus, let Ethel and Ralph wake up and come home. They've been asleep long enough. We can't live without them. If they can't wake up yet, dear Jesus, then take me away too, and let me sleep here in a little green bed, where dear mamma will come and look after me, every day."

The child's prayer was interrupted here. His mother dropped the flowers she had brought for her dead children, and caught to her heart, with a close embrace, her one remaining child.

"Hugh, darling," she said, "Come home with mamma. Ethel and Ralph are both safe in the arms of Jesus, but you are still here with me. Come home, and help poor Mamma to be happy again."

On Easter Sunday, the Elmores went to church, and Hugh carried in his little hand a lily which he set among the flowers. Other beautiful flowers were there, and Mr. and Mrs. Elmore, after the service, paid their visit as usual to the children's graves, taking Hugh with them. But they had learned a new lesson.

"God had to draw us heavenward," the father said, "All our treasures were not to be kept here. Part of it is kept for us there. Dear wife, dear little son, we must go home and be brave and be cheerful, for two of our circle are standing in the sweet presence of the Lord."

"And will Mamma sing again," said Hugh.

"Yes," she answered, and at home the locked piano was opened and she played a familiar air, while they all joined in "Sun of my soul, thou Saviour dear."

"Ah!" said old Mammy Lucy, "de blessed Jesus done comforted dem poor things his own way."

And so the tender, forgiving and compassionate Saviour had. It was an Easter of the heart.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

"DEY'LL WAKE UP, ONE OF DESE DAYS," SAID MAMMY LUCY.

TRUST IN DARKNESS.

STILL keep up hope when times are dark.
Think there is good in store,
Be mindful of the mercies left,
And count them o'er and o'er.
The same pure gold of sunshine fills
The same blue sky above.
The same bright stars gleam in its depths,
Unchanging rays of love.

The same good God to care for us.
The same sweet hope of heaven.
His word the same, his truth shines clear,
Duties and helps still given.
Hope still in God, an angel kind
Of help, unseen, still stands.
Ready to aid, when duty calls,
To strengthen willing hands.

Hope for the best all cheerfully,
Still for the worst prepare.
Then take whate'er the Father sends,
Rest in his loving care.
Rest in the Lord, wait patiently
To know his will divine.
Until earth's shadows all shall flee.
And Heaven's pure day shall shine.

Berlin, Mass. —PHEBE A. HOLDER.

One Godly Woman's Work.

WHEN beholding the architecture of some great bridge, spanning a river, admiring its massive stones and stout girders, and its great, elastic but stanch cables, one seldom gives a thought to the huge stones that lie embedded in the depths of the waters; and yet to think of them but for a moment is to know that upon those hidden blocks the safety and security of the structure depends. There is an analogy in this that applies to many of the labors in the Church of Christ; that is, that not all who do telling service for the Master are seen or known of men; but like the sunken masonry of some great structure, are doing a service the importance of which is as much to the advancement of the work of the Kingdom, as that which is done by those whose labor is seen of all.

MRS. FISHER.
Missionary and Evangelist.

Mrs. Geo. Fisher (whose portrait appears above), is such a worker, upon whose humble efforts God has set his seal of approval. She is one of the few who may be said to have a capacity for work. Mr. Moody, has said that "God's reward for service is more work," and in her case, one task done leads to another. From the first day of her mission life, found her with her hand on the plough in soul-work, and the many homes where she has dwelt both in England and America have been to her a field of labor. She has proved it true "that there is a work for us anywhere," by finding something to do for the Master everywhere, a truth that every true Christian realizes.

When on the cotton plantations of Texas, her magnetism drew the colored people, among whom she found material to work for the glory of her Master. During her residence in Chicago, she helped in carrying on a precious work in the Market Street Mission, often going alone through dangerous highways to that hallowed place and single-handed conducting the meetings, a lone, weak woman in the midst of forty to seventy drunken desperate men and women; but "the angel of his presence" sustained her, and many to-day are leading earnest Christian lives through her courageous ministry in that dark place.

While in South Dakota she found a mission field upon which to spend her energies. Her husband rented a house in a part of their town known as "Poverty Flats," but its greatest poverty lay in its spiritual destitution: for there were scores of children running wild, and there were many parents who had never entered a church. Aided by her sister, a devoted Christian, she started cottage prayer-meetings, then opened her house and established a Sunday School with only six children at first, but it grew so rapidly that twice it had to change quarters, and in one year it had 128 members. The W. C. T. U. made her their local evangelist. With a family of five little children, superintending a Sunday School, presiding over a sewing and aid society, and doing the work of an evangelist, yet she never neglected home or children.

Mrs. Fisher is now in Minnesota, where she still finds a spiritual work to do. Her chief pleasure is in the winning of souls for heaven and her spiritual labors will end only when her busy life closes.

Among the many philanthropies in which the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been interested, probably none has attracted them more warmly than the work at our "Children's Home" at Nyack-on-the-Hudson, which last summer sheltered, fed and entertained 1124 poor tenement waifs from the New York slums, the children of destitute families, helped by the Food Fund the previous winter. An account of the financial result of the first season's work at the Home appears on this page. It will enter on its second season in June next, with the greatest encouragement, and with the advantage of a good equipment already secured. The co-operation of our friends will be welcomed.

GATHER THEM IN.

THE regularly organized churches might stand with all their doors wide open until the crack of doom, and they would not reach some people. The front siege guns of the Church take too long to get into position, and they cannot be unlimbered. We must have mounted cavalry, all the spurs in the flanks, with one bold dash plunging into the heart of the world's abominations. What are we doing for those who were tumbled into life by an ancestry as careless of them as the ostriches of the wilderness are careless of what becomes of their young, and who have been battered and bruised of evil surrounding all the way? It is despicable to stand on shore and do nothing for the shipwrecked struggling in the breakers, when we ought to be getting out the rockets, and the life-boats, and the ropes from the wrecking establishment.

How much have you ever done to get this class ashore? We grip them of the police. Then we hustle them into a court-room, amid a great crowd of gaping spectators. Then we throw them into a jail. The time of punishment served out, he comes forth, and society follows him down the street, and blocks up his way to honest employment by practically pointing at him and saying, "Out of jail! Just got out of jail! What a joke! Don't touch him! Out of jail! There have not been many cases like that of Jerry McAuley. Sentenced to Sing Sing for fifteen years, yet so thoroughly and grandly converted that Wm. E. Dodge, and Governor Morgan, and John B. Gough felt honored to sit beside him on the anniversary platform of the Cremorne Mission. Men and brethren, sisters and daughters in Christ Jesus, there are down in these lower depths people just as much worth saving. Let us expect them to come to you. You go to them. By the Gospel of shoes, and stockings, and coats; by the Gospel of anthracite coal when the thermometer is near zero; by the Gospel of bread well kneaded, well raised, and well baked; by temporal relief, accompanied by spiritual relief, go forth, praying that Christ may go with you. The great harvest day comes when we must give an account of our faithfulness or unfaithfulness. Time goes rapidly by, and soon the books will be opened, and you and I must answer, not only for our own treatment of the Gospel of Christ, but for the manner in which we have brought that Gospel to others. Let us gather up all our energies of body, mind and soul for a mightier campaign than we have ever entered. To arms! In all this great battle against sin and death, and hell eternal shall be the reward of him that overcometh.

MERCIFUL OPINIONS.

AS the years go by let us grow more lenient. When we hear things adverse to anyone, let us always remember there is another side. How often we are compelled to change our opinions of men and things. There frequently comes a great outburst of feeling against public men, and after a vast expenditure of reprehension, we hear a satisfactory explanation. We let the dogs out of the kennel for a chase that ought never to be made. After awhile, our own turn comes to be pursued, and then we learn by bitter experience how one may be misrepresented and belied. We all need in the caster on the table a cruet of sweet oil, as well as cruets of vinegar and cayenne. We need to put ourselves into more frequent associations with dispositions mild and genial, and that think no evil. Charity! Beautiful grace and rare! We all need more of it in our speech and lives. Above all, by constant communion with Christ, we will absorb something of that gentleness and love which were the characteristics of his life. No one can be much with Christ without catching something of his spirit. On the contrary, it is impossible to be much with the hypercritical and acerb, without ourselves becoming hypercritical and acerb. Avoid those who would rather believe evil of others than good. Keep out of the patch of nettles, and walk in the garden of the Lord. Waste no time in hearing gossip, scandalizing others. As soon as she unties the strings of her hat and leans back to have a good talk, excuse yourself, and get out into the fresh air, and look up at the stars, and think of God. In the first year of my ministry, I heard that which has impressed me to this day. I heard in a parlor a minister of religion most violently condemning a sin of a brother minister, saying that he never could be tempted to such a crime. It was right that he should condemn the sin, but I did not like the self-righteous declaration that he never could be tempted that way. Before three years had passed, that minister was tried for the same crime, and condemned, the jury staying out only a few moments, so evident was the guilt. The condemned man died of a broken heart, and his body went to Greenwood, and his soul to that God who, I hope, had more mercy on him than he had on his fallen brother. "He shall have judgment without mercy who hath shown no mercy."

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

If any of our readers who know of a zealous Christian workers in their neighborhood who, without fee or reward, are devoting time and means to the service of Christ in rescuing the lost, uplifting the fallen, or befriending the sick and poor, would send us biographical sketches of such persons—men or women—we should be glad. The story of their work, showing their methods and the success which has attended them, might encourage other Christian people to undertake similar work in their cities. The sketch should be accompanied in every instance by a photograph of the person. Address Editor of Christian Workers Department, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

Inquirer, Klinger, Ia. Should a Christian girl marry a man who is not a Christian, but who will become one if she would consent to marry him?

Such marriages usually prove a disappointment. The hope of "reforming" a person before marriage may or may not be realized.

J. McComber, Harrisburg, Pa. Was black always the mourning color among Christian nations?

No. Before the fifteenth century, at least it was customary for widows to mourn in white. Queen Anne of France, when King Charles VIII. died, draped her coat of arms in black and clad herself in the same hue, thus setting a fashion in a large part of Europe which has been maintained ever since.

Laura Camp, Cleveland, O. Is there in the Buddhistic theology any equivalent of the "Tree of Knowledge," as we find it in the Bible?

In a sense—yes. In one legend (the "Lalita Vistara"), Bodhiswata, after a long fast and overcoming many temptations, eats food and bathes twice in the Mairanjara river. Then emerging, he advances to the Tree of Knowledge, beneath which he vowed to sit without rising until he should attain the "Bodhi." He is terribly tempted, but ultimately triumphs.

Subscriber, Brookline, Mass. Where was St. Patrick born, who were his parents? Was he carried away in slavery? Did he return home?

According to "The Story of St. Patrick," by Joseph Sanderson, D.D., LL.D., recently issued, he was born near Dumbarton, Scotland, on the river Clyde, sometime between the years 373 and 396—the exact date being uncertain. In his "Confession," Patrick says: I had for my father, Calpornius, a deacon who dwelt in the village of Bannavein Taberniæ, for he had a small farm hard by the place. I was taken captive. I was then nearly sixteen years of age. I was taken captive to Ireland." Patrick escaped from slavery and, as he himself relates, took ship and returned to his former home.

Harry F. Hamer, Bart, Pa. Do any of the Egyptian inscriptions show that the Pharaoh of the Exodus was drowned in the Red Sea?

It is by no means certain who was the Pharaoh of the Exodus. Some scholars hold that it was Meneptah the son of Rameses II. Manetho held that the Exodus occurred in the reign of Amos. Wilkinson argues that Thothmes III. was the Pharaoh of the Exodus. On the whole, probability points to Meneptah. There is no mention in any inscription yet deciphered of his having been drowned in the Red Sea. On the contrary, it would appear from the inscriptions that he lived some years after the disasterious calamity, to which there is vague reference on the monuments and which Bible scholars indentify with the death of the first born and the destruction of the army. Meneptah was notoriously a timid man, who never would go with the army to the shores of the sea and would be little likely to venture across. The fact of his remaining behind may not have been known at the time either to his army or to Moses.

J. W. Knott, Holdrege, Nebr., writes: "In THE HERALD of March 13 in reply to J. P. Snyder, Auburn, Pa., you prefix "St." to the names of all the apostles except Judas. Doubtless Judas would have been written "St." before the betrayal, for Paul calls all professing Christians "saints" on the charitable assumption that they are simply believers. Is it not preposterous to call all Christians "saints," and not others? Is not the persistent dubbing of a few prominent Christians as "Saints" a relic of Romish canonization and suggestive more of the Middle Ages than of the earlier Christians or of modern times?

It is not now customary, in Protestant churches to use the word "Saint," and our correspondent is quite right in his claim that the usage is a relic of Rome. It is still used in the Anglican and Greek, as well as the Roman churches.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

INVESTING A PRINCE.

A QUAINT ceremony was observed a few days ago at the Siamese Legation in London. With Oriental pomp and with many ancient forms, a boy of sixteen was formally invested with the titles and signia of heir to the throne of Siam. Early s year the eldest son of the king of that tion died, and it became necessary to ect from the other sons of the king one 10 should succeed him on the throne. The oice fell on Prince Chowa Maya Vadjira idh, who is being educated in the famous l English school of Eton. The king sent o of the boy's uncles to London to perform e ceremony of investiture, and summon- from the various European capitals the mbassadors of Siam to witness it. The mpany in their court uniforms, glittering th jewels, presented a gorgeous appear- ce. One bore a gold tray on which ere ranged the seals of office, which are ed only by the heir-apparent. Another rried a sword, the scab- rd of which sparkled th rubies and diamonds. his has been worn by all e crown princes of Siam former generations from ncient times. Other ords, each indicating me office in the State or ny or navy were also nded to the boy, and gold chain and insignia the Order of the White ephant were put around neck. As each part of e ceremony was per- med, the court official ited the ancient formula pertaining to it and pro- imed the prince's name d titles with all the iental fulsome extrava- gance. In conclusion, the nce himself made a odest little speech to the gh dignitaries assem- d, thanking them for ir congratulations and suring them that he uld strive earnestly to mote the interests of his ntry, while he should end on their counsel d guidance. The re- rts of his tutors and fel- -students indicate that is a lad of high intel- ence and brilliant talents and there is a spect of his making an enlightened ruler Siam, when he comes to the throne, if that time any remnant of the country is to him by the French, who have al- dy stolen a large part of it. It was prob- y those qualities of character that led to being selected as heir, by the king, with om the choice rested. Had he not pos- sed them, the king would have been lit- likely to make him his heir. It is not so th those on whom is conferred the in- itely higher dignity of heirs of the King kings. All are eligible, even the ignor- t, the pauper and the outcast for with dignity he gives the qualities appropri- to it. (I. Cor. 6: 9-11.)

A Physician's Mistake.

A suit has been commenced against a sician in Staten Island for damages re- ting from a mistake in diagnosis. It is ught by an undertaker who has just re- ered from a bad attack of small-pox. ne time ago there were several cases of kness in the village which were pro- inced by the physician to be chicken- c. Among them were two children who d. The undertaker who prepared the dies for interment fell sick shortly after- rd. His case and the cases of several er sufferers in the village were declared other physicians in the village to be all-pox. Several experts confirmed that gnosis, and as the physician who had opted the chicken-pox theory was firm in intaining his opinion, the State Board of Health was appealed to, and their official inspectors decided against him and ordered a quarantine against the village. The undertaker had a long illness and for some time his life was despaired of. He now brings suit against the physician, claiming that if he had been notified of the true nature of the disease from which the children died, whose bodies he buried, he would have taken precautions against the contagion, and would not have caught the disease. However that may be, he would have had no ground of action against the physician, had the latter warned him of his danger. So it will be at the last with the people who have listened to the preaching of God's servants. The preacher cannot keep his people from evil, but he can tell them its true nature and warn them of its consequences. (Ezek. 33: 8.)

A Daring Rescue.

One of those deeds of daring, which firemen are noted for, was done in New York on March 28. A hotel on Columbus Ave., caught fire in the night. The alarm was given, and it was thought that all the inmates made their escape. But the crowd watching the fire saw a woman at a window on the sixth floor who seemed helpless. The firemen knew that the flames were roaring up the elevator shaft as if it were a chimney and that the stairs were already impassable with fire and smoke. One man, however, determined to rescue the woman if possible. He hooked his light scaling ladder to a fire escape and climbed up from story to story, outside the building, until he reached the window where the woman had been seen. He found her there still, imprisoned by the flames and having given up hope. She was the cook of the hotel, a large woman weighing nearly two hundred pounds. The fireman was a small man whose weight was at least fifty pounds less, but he persuaded the woman to sit on his shoulder and, so weighted, he descended the ladder. The crowd was almost breathless as it watched the brave man bringing his burden down from story to story, and when he reached the lowest floor and placed the woman in safety, a great shout went up from a hundred throats. Not a few thought that the man was inadequate to the task and all were glad to see it safely and successfully accomplished. There are cases of spiritual rescue on record in which the means God used to save men seemed to human eyes similarly inadequate. He who has faith need never be deterred from attempting to save a soul, by the consideration of his own deficiencies. (II. Cor. 4: 7.)

INVESTITURE OF THE CROWN PRINCE OF SIAM WITH THE INSIGNIA OF OFFICE.

Correcting the Compass.

An illustration of the nicety of calculation involved in some scientific operations was given recently in a lecture before the Institution of Civil Engineers, by Dr. John Hopkinson. It was an explanation of the variations of the mariner's compass under various conditions and in various degrees of latitude and longitude. The compass, he said, was affected by the temporary or permanent magnetism of the ship, besides being disturbed by the variations in the magnetic pole, which are greater in some regions than in others. These had now been reduced to a carefully arranged system, so that it was known precisely to what extent under any circumstances the needle would vary from the true north. Several devices had been adopted for correcting the variation and one of these he described. It consisted in placing permanent magnets in such positions in the neighborhood of the compass as to counteract all other influences. The calculations involved in selecting the places for the magnets were of a most complicated character, requiring the skill of highly accomplished mathematicians. It is easy to see that the professor was right. A magnet placed too near the compass or in the wrong position might so deflect the sensitive needle as to make it an unsafe guide and cause the loss of a ship. Souls have been lost in the same way. Even the conscience which God gave us as the guide of our lives may become warped and deviating when selfish principles are planted in the soul and suffered to exert their influence in the life. (I. Timothy 4: 2.)

The Wounded Envoy.

Sincere sorrow is expressed by the Japanese Government at the outrage on Li Hung Chang, the venerable Chinese statesman, who has gone to Japan to sue for peace on behalf of China. As he was returning to his quarters at Shimonoseki from a conference with the Japanese statesmen, on March 24, a young Japanese ruffian, named Koyama, rushed at him and fired a pistol at his face. The bullet struck his upper jaw, inflicting a painful wound. Of itself it is not thought to be dangerous, but, as Li Hung Chang is seventy-three years old, and has been for several months in bad health, the consequences may become serious. It appears that the lower classes in Japan are strongly affected by the warfever, and cherish a vindictive feeling against China, especially those who have lost relatives in the war. The would-be assassin has been arrested, and the prefect and chief of police of Shimonoseki have been deprived of their offices by the emperor's order, for failing to protect the envoy. The peace negotiations had barely commenced when the crime was committed. Li Hung Chang was trying to secure a cessation of hostilities during the negotiations, but the Japanese would consent to the armistice only on conditions which the Chinese were unwilling to grant. On hearing of the crime, the Japanese Emperor directed an armistice to be granted without conditions. Thus the envoy's suffering won a concession that all his skill as a diplomatist had failed to gain, and may have saved thousands of lives. It would seem as if the principle of atonement ran all through human affairs. The Chinese will be able to appreciate this boon. Would that they might learn, too, the greater lesson, that because of Christ's suffering they may be saved from eternal wrath through him! (Rom. 5: 9.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Here is a Quite Unusual Opportunity for a few of our readers to secure a beautiful and complete ruby type International Teachers' Bible at small cost. The Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has on hand about 100 of these Bibles, still in the original wrapping, and which have been rubbed almost imperceptibly– of course otherwise the book is absolutely perfect. Any reader forwarding one dollar will receive one of these Bibles, expressage prepaid.

When Dr. Talmage Invited Any Persons in his audience at the New York Academy of Music on March 31, who desired the prayers of God's people, to rise, fully two thousand persons responded. This confirms the impression previously formed, that the greater part of the audiences at the Academy of Music are non-church-goers.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has secured the services of Arthur J. Brown, D.D., of Portland, Ore., as corresponding secretary. It will be remembered; that after the death of Dr. Arthur Mitchell, Dr. George D. Baker, of Philadelphia, was elected to the position. But he declined, feeling unwilling to leave his pastorate.

S. Hartwell Pratt Closed his third series of meetings in Los Angeles, Cal., March 10th, and is now engaged in union meetings at Oakland. Cal.

Mr. Langdon S. Ward, who has served the American Board as Treasurer for thirty years, died at his home at Newton Centre, Mass., on March 28. Mr. Ward was sixty-seven years of age when he died.

Dr. J. W. Chapman Has closed a great work at Evansville, Ind. The daily newspapers say that the results of the meetings and the method and spirit which characterize them, promise to be deep and lasting. From Evansville Dr. Chapman went to Passaic, N. J.

The Ambassadors to Turkey from England, France and Russia presented to the Sultan on March 28 a joint memorial, calling his attention to the threatened outbreak of Mohammedans against the Christians of Diarbekir, which might be as disastrous as that at Sassoon. The Sultan assured them that he would immediately issue peremptory orders for the protection of the Christians.

A Man Supposed to be a reputable artisan was converted at a meeting of the Salvation Army in Seattle, Wash. He made the confession that he derived the greater part of his income from counterfeiting. He went to the Federal authorities and surrendered himself.

Church Members Seeking Employment or wishing to add to their income may hear of something to their advantage, by sending their names and addresses to Box J, Station D, New York.

Rev. H. W. Brown's Campaign in Canada has resulted in a large ingathering of souls. At Blenheim, Vittoria, and Chatham the attendance was very large. In each place the largest buildings were filled, and the prayer meetings were thronged.

Churches and Sunday Schools Financially distressed or in need of additional funds, will do well to send promptly the name and full post office address of their Treasurer, also of the Chief Officer of their Ladies' Aid Society, together with the name and denomination of their church, to George H. Sandison, 53 Fourth avenue, New York.

Rev. Robert Lennie, of Sherbrooke, Quebec, writes us that Messrs. Elliott and Butts are closing a very successful mission at the First Baptist Church of that town. As the numbers who came from the surrounding district increased, meetings were held in the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches. Toward the close prayer meetings were held in twenty-five distinct neighborhoods and a large number of persons have been brought to Christ.

Mr. R. Sewell Recently Read a Paper Before the Asiatic Society in London, announcing the finding of a small beryl casket, which is now in Madras. The casket contained three fragments of charred bone, and was found, enclosed in several outer caskets of stone, in a monument on the banks of the Kistna. Mr. Sewell said that there was no doubt among the scholars of India of the bones being part of the body of Buddha, which was cremated more than five undred years before the Christian era.

The Rev. H. Waddell of the U. P. Mission of Scotland, reports that some time ago a copy of the New Testamen(was given to a man connected with the railway service in Tokyo, Japan. He cared nothing for Christianity, and without examining the book he began to use it for waste paper. But happening one day to see the words, "Love your enemies," he was so struck with the expression that he procured a new copy of the book and studied it, with the result that he and his family are now Christians.

WINNING SOULS FOR CHRIST.

The Work of the San Francisco Christian Union Mission Among the Homeless and Christless Men—Thousands Helped in two Years and Many led to the Saviour.

THE Christian Union Mission of San Francisco was organized by Evangelists B.Fay Mills and C.N.Crittenton, at a meeting of city pastors and Christian business men, in August, 1892, their object being to provide shelter and relief for the destitute, to reclaim the fallen and at the same time furnish employment for them. The work was formally presented by Mr. Mills, in his closing services in the Mechanics' Pavilion, on August 31st of that year, and in response to his appeal for funds $7,000 were pledged to start it, and $300 per month for its support. A representative Board of Directors was selected, and Mr. T. B. Roberts, Superintendent of the Industrial Homes in Boston, was engaged to assist in the work of organization. Rev. S. P. Holcombe of Detroit, Mich., was elected Superintendent, and Mr. J. G. Chown, Financial Secretary. On Nov. 1st, 1892, the building at 729 Market st., known as the Bijou Theatre was leased, and thoroughly fitted for the contemplated work. The formal dedication took place on the 10th of the same month, and services were held every night thereafter.

On account of the many changes that had to be made in the building, the relief work could not be commenced till January 1,1893, when meals and lodgings were furnished and the wood-yard opened. Rescue work for girls was also begun, with Mrs. Holcombe as Matron. The opening was most encouraging and the numbers attending the services were remarkable. The Hall contained seats for 500, and frequently every seat was taken. In a short time, many had accepted Christ as their Saviour, and large numbers were being fed and lodged.

In May, 1893, Superintendent Holcombe resigned, and Financial Secretary Chown was given full charge of the work. After a trial the wood-yard was given up and a laundry was next tried temporarily. On August 15, 1893, the Mission removed to the First United Presbyterian Church property on Mason street, which was then vacant. There the Girls' Department was made a separate work and removed to 26 Hill street, where it is still continued under the management of a Board of Ladies. The Mission meanwhile continued its work, and was supported largely from the sale of meal tickets, the Associated Charities and other benevolent associations sending the men who worked in their wood-yards to the Mission for meals and lodgings.

On April 1, 1894, owing to the sale of the church property, the mission was transferred to a building formerly used as an armory at the corner of Mission and Anthony streets, having two large floors 60 x 100 ft. The building was leased and was reconstructed as follows: On the first floor the chapel, with seats for 250; dining-room, kitchen, reading-room, sitting-room, students' bed-room and office. The upper floor contains a dormitory with 130 beds, bedrooms for help, laundry, bath-rooms, etc., all of which are well furnished and excellently adapted to the work. The First Presbyterian Church offered to assume the [illegible] for one year, which offer the Board of Directors [illegible]. With [illegible] the new management began with Thanksgiving Day, 1894, at which time a free dinner [illegible] employed men, and the chapel, which was [illegible] ing exercises. Gospel services have been conducted every night since, with the exception of Wednesdays which is the regular night for church prayer meeting. The Superintendent conducts services on Monday, Tuesday and Thursday, Rev. W. C. Merrill, Associate Pastor of the Church, preaching that evening. Students from the San Anselmo Theological Seminary aid in conducting the Friday, Saturday and Sunday night services. A number of the societies of Y.P.S.C.E. take one evening a month each to lead in the singing. Interest in the services is generally good and the average attendance is about one hundred men.

The spiritual results of this work are to be found in many city churches in San Francisco. Those converted in the Mission since its opening, if gathered in one church, would show the largest membership in the city. Thousands of poor men, who have rested in the clean beds, and partaken of the meals provided by the Mission, are a constant testimony of the interest the church and its people take in the poor and downtrodden. Some are holding good positions, secured through the Free Employment Bureau, which has already found work for several hundred men. Families, divided by the drinking habit and other causes, are again united. Many sick have been cared for and some have been sent to their homes. Clothing has been furnished for a large number, and letters have been written to distant friends and help secured for destitute ones. Converts, whose lives have been transformed in the Mission, come from all walks of life; the rich and the poor have met together, and the man priding himself on his good morals has been reached, as well as the most degraded and hopeless. Reports of the work are made from month to month, and the prospect for the future is very encouraging.

SUNSHINE AND SHADOW.

Sin is like a shadow; forgiveness like the sun,
There never could be either, without the other one:
And when the shadow flees before the sunlight fair,
No trace of it is seen—it leaves no land-mark there.

DIVINE WISDOM.

DEAR Lord, the wisdom now I see,
Is [illegible] me so good to be!
For when earth's vanities on me smile,
They but my thoughts from thee beguile.

The [illegible] with all my heart—
O, never let it from me part—
In when the storms of life are o'er,
To meet with thee, to part no more.

A YOUNG HERO.

The present Chinese-Japanese war has been the cause of bringing to light many interesting incidents in the early lives of the leading participants in the victorious Japanese army. Concerning Count Yamagata, the commander-in-chief of the Mikado's forces, this characteristic incident is related:

His quality of heroism developed at the age of ten. One warm summer day he was taking a stroll under the shade of a paper umbrella; as usual, he had his books with him, and giving very little attention to his path, was absorbed in his reading. Suddenly he heard women's screams and children's shrill shrieks. Facing about, he saw a horseman of the noble rank of Samurai, whose beast was frantically running in his direction. The bridle dangled before the brute's forelegs, and the rider, unable to reach it, hung to his saddle and shouted to pedestrians to get out of danger. The people were not slow to obey the command, add the nobleman now saw in the road only a delicate-looking boy of ten.

"Abunai yo! (look out)" shouted the horseman from a distance. But Ariake, who had calmly folded his umbrella and dropped his books, did not budge. He waited until the frantic beast was almost upon him, then, swift as lightning, opened the umbrella and spread it in the horse's face. That checked the runaway. The animal came to a stop and the nobleman sprang from his back, and catching the bridle,held the horse firmly.

"Let the horse cool," the boy advised gently, while the nobleman overwhelmed him with praise. The Samurai, after making the animal fast, picked up his little rescuer and held him in his arms.

"Some day, my noble little fellow," predicted the Samurai, "you will be the glory of the Land of the Rising Sun."

The Samurai's prediction has been abundantly verified for Yamagata who has led the armies of Japan to triumph after triumph during the present war, is lovingly regarded as his country's greatest hero.

PRIEST-RIDDEN CEYLON.

Rev. W. D. Hankinson writes as follows to the English Baptist Society concerning Buddhism in Ceylon: "There are 9950 priests at present in the island. Each wears a long yellow robe, and possesses an alms-bowl in which he receives his food. From house to house he moves, and silently takes his stand before each, and with his alms-bowl in front of him, waits for a small gift of rice, plantains, etc. The giver often does obeisance to the priest, and in the case of one sect the priest pronounces a blessing before departing. Priests of the other sects depart in silence. No priest must take a meal after twelve o'clock noon. When my friend called in to see me the other day, one of his attendants several times tested the hour by the length of his shadow, lest the priest be too late to partake of his breakfast."

Relief Work Closed.

Spring at hand and the Suffering Practically Ended—Grateful Letters.

SPRING is at hand and with the approach of fine weather, the long winter distress in the West is rapidly becoming a thing of the past. Occasional complaints of suffering are still received from remote places in Nebraska and Kansas; but these are promptly communicated to the State Relief Commission at Lincoln, Neb., or the Topeka "Capital," Kansas, and steps taken for supplying any urgent needs. In such cases where a local relief commission has been organized, it is made the medium through which the aid comes to the applicant. This has been found necessary to avoid imposture, and the sending of relief moneys or goods where they are not really needed.

In these closing hours of the charitable work in the West, it is cheering to know from letters received, that the generosity of our readers has been very warmly appreciated.

From his study at Holdrege, Neb., Rev. C. A. Hale, writes:

The ministers and people of southwestern Nebraska will not soon forget your interest in us, or your substantial help in the time of our distress. You will perhaps like a word from my district which is under particular obligation to you for help. A sense of great relief comes to us with the warm weather. The winter is actually passed and none of our people have perished. For this we are thankful to God and his people. But "sufficient unto the day is the need thereof. There is no more food in one thousand homes than in cold weather. Many are seeking seed and feed. We can but pray for the success, longingly looking for the coming of the trains with the elements of a very much-needed harvest.

$250 have been sent to Pastor Hale from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund. W. Atlee Burpee & Co., seed growers, Philadelphia, last week forwarded three large boxes of seed to Manager Ludden at Lincoln for distribution in Nebraska. Messrs. Gregory & Co., Marblehead, Mass., and other seedsmen have also been forwarding considerable quantities to local committees, in accordance with their promise, recently published.

In Oklahoma and South Dakota, the liberal food supplies received have relieved much suffering; but the seed question remains. Rev. C. Regier, Pastor of the German Baptist Church at Fairfax, D.T., writes:

Gregory County has received some supplies of food so that none really had to die of starvation, but there is no money nor credit for most of our farmers to secure the least bit of wheat or corn to plant to get food for the coming season.

The Fund has forwarded $100 to Pastor Regier. Rev. J.H.Parker, Kingfisher, Oklahoma, and Rev. W. H. Thrall, Huron, S. D., write reporting progress in the relief work in their respective districts. Mr. Jacob Bush, Lillivale, Okla., writes that the people of that section are able to care for their own poor and that there are no cases of destitution.

MORE LIGHT ON THE FLOOD.

European Explorers Find in the vast Volcanic Regions of Central Asia Evidences of the Great Noachian Deluge.

IN an article in the "Gala" of Leipsic, which has been translated by the "Literary Digest," there is given a remarkably interesting account of the exploration of Herr F. von Schwarz, in Central Asia, which has led to the discovery of what that savant is led to regard as incontestible evidence of the reality and vastness of the Noachian deluge. Primitive man, Prof. Schwarz asserts, would never have left Central Asia as he did, to scatter himself over the greater part of Europe, had he not been driven thence. The great catastrophe that compelled the dispersion is identified with the Flood. When it was and how it occurred his discovery revealed to him for the first time.

His discovery was made while Prof. Schwarz was investigating a rocky hill in Central Asia, marked wrongly on the Russian charts as the site of the ruins of Kutagai. The Russian surveyors were led by the extraordinary resemblance of its naked rocks to the walls of a ruined city with towers and battlements. We quote from Schwarz's account:

"When I had passed the rocky wall I found myself in a broad, deep valley, extending north and south and shut in by perpendicular walls of rock at whose feet flowed a slender rivulet. This valley was the oddest that I have ever seen in my life. Though the brook had so little water that only in the deepest parts was there enough for a sitz-bath, and the valley was so broad and deep that a navigable river might have flowed through it, the rocky walls on both sides, up to the upper edge, were torn apart and eroded in such fashion as I have noticed near no other river and as only happens on a rocky seashore—commonly, indeed, only on shore where the breakers are very powerful.

"The following September, he ascended to the summit of Mount Kutagai, and afterward wrote:

"I noticed on the Tianschan mountain, which lay opposite me, a characteristic line traced always at the same height, and dividing the mountain into two very distinct parts. The upper half, above the line, was of dark color and composed apparently of old, cleft and weather-beaten rock; the part lying below was of a gray tint and seemed to be covered with sand, clay, and gravel . . . The more distant rocks that lay beneath the above-mentioned mark were gray, eroded stones, which were so exactly like rocky reefs washed by the sea that my Cossack guide could not help exclaiming 'there we can see just how high the flood reached.' The marks could be nothing else but water marks, and the whole valley of Dschungaria and the part of Mongolia bordering on it . . . must accordingly have been covered by the sea up to the height of this mark, which lay considerably above the point where I stood. The existence of but a single mark, and the wide inlet between Alatau and Barlyk, which lies at nearly equal height with Dschungaria, showed that the sea had not been dried up, but had suddenly flowed out and must have overflooded the Balkash plain and the whole Ural-Caspian lowland. This outflow evidently took place through the inlet just mentioned, and the enormous mass of water, which covered all Central Asia and formed a sea of the size of the present Mediterranean, rushed over Mount Kutagai in a stream at least twenty-five kilometers (fifteen miles) wide and 4,000 to 5,000 feet deep, with a swiftness of which the speed of a rushing mountain torrent or even a cataract, can give only a feeble idea . . . The facts that the Baritala valley and Dschungaria still present exactly the appearance of a sea bottom that has only recently dried, that the water-marks are still to be so plainly seen and indicate no rising and falling due to latter seismic movements, that the Kaptagai mountain has not yet lost its polish through weathering, and that the results of the outflow of the Mongolian sea remain till the present time, show plainly that the outflow of this sea must have taken place not in a remote geological period, but in recent times, and indeed at a time when the Indo-Germanic and Semitic races and the various Mongolic peoples already inhabited their primitive home. Such a frightful catastrophe could surely not fail to make a lasting impression on the people that witnessed it that its traditions would not be lost through thousands of years, but would last till the present in the guise of the history of Noah's Flood.

"Schwarz's theory supposes this sea to have been lifted bodily by the elevation of the whole Central Asiatic region and then precipitated upon the adjoining lowlands by the rupture of its mountain barrier, perhaps by some earthquake, drowning all the dwellers in the Balkish plain, the Uralo-Caspian lowlands, and the Sahara.

"The alteration of the climate and soil due to the outflow of the Mongolian sea, most of the dwellers in Central Asia were driven from their homes and scattered over the whole earth. Thus hundreds of millions of men were sent out. . . . The results of the Flood endure to the present, and we may rightly conclude that all later emigrations and most of the wars that have been waged from the earliest historical periods till now are only a necessary consequence of the disturbance of equilibrium in the natural dispositions of races and peoples due to the Flood.

A CHEERFUL GIVER.

GIVE to the Lord in gladness,
Give of thy goods a share;
Give of thy gold and silver
And give it with a prayer.

Give from thy well-filled coffers,
Give of thy treasured mite,
And praise him in the giving,
Yea, praise him day and night.

Give to the Lord good measure,
Pressed down and running o'er;
Give prayer and praise and treasure
To the Lord evermore. —M.D.O.

AN EVENING SONG.

THO' weary my feet, as I toil down the slope
On the road to the setting sun;
My heart is made strong by a steadfast hope,
When I think what Jesus hath done.

He redeemed me, and led me in safety along
Thro' the dangers of many a fray;
In the sorrows of night he hath given me song,
And strengthened my soul by day.

My years have been many, my cares not a few,
But my Saviour hath given me peace;
With content to the end, I'll my journey pursue,
Till from labor I find sweet release.

Then in Heaven my home with the friends gone before,
My King in his beauty I'll see;
I'll worship, and praise him, and tell o'er and o'er,
How he saved a poor sinner like me.

THE EASTER PLEDGE.

Christ's Resurrection a Pledge of the Resurrection of His People.

BY REV. J. GOSSET-TANNER.

WE are all agreed that the blessed hope for which we are waiting is the appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. Next in order we cannot help longing to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven—the glorified body. And we know that both these events will take place at the same moment, for we read in Col. 3: 4, "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory."

It is, when the Saviour comes from heaven, as Paul says to the Philippians, that he would change the body of our humiliation, and fashion it like unto the body of his glory. And then the all-important question arises, when will this first resurrection take place, and is there scriptural ground for concluding that the resurrection of the just will ante-date the resurrection of the unjust by at least a thousand years.

There is much scriptural truth upon this subject with which I doubt not you are familiar, but there is another line of argument which seems to me important and conclusive. It is this:—the Lord Jesus Christ is confessedly one with his Church. As Paul teaches, Eph. 5: 30, "We are members of his flesh and of his bone." Not merely, you see, one spirit, but one body—one flesh, and in Rom. 8: we are told, "Whom he did foreknow he also predestinated to be conformed, or made like to, the image (that is the pattern) of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren." So these, the brethren, are to be like the first-born of the family in every respect.

Now, it is undoubtedly true that all the saints died in Christ. "If one died, then all died." If, then, we are one with Christ in his death, it follows that we are one with him in his resurrection. Indeed, Paul argues in Rom. 6: 5, "For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection."

Now, was not the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ a special and an exceptional resurrection out from among the great body of the dead? "Christ, the first-fruits," (1 Cor. 15: 23). And if the resurrection of the Head was an exceptional resurrection, must not the resurrection of all the brethren be like unto the first-born, special and exceptional too? When the Lord Jesus Christ rose from the dead the rest of the dead slept on, and there is, therefore, a strong scriptural argument for concluding that seeing we are already in some sort blended together with Christ in the likeness of his resurrection, that we should be raised from our graves whilst the rest of the dead will sleep on.

Indeed, we have this thought alluded to Heb. 13: 20, where it is as the great Shepherd of the Sheep that God raised from the dead our Lord Jesus, and should not all the sheep be carried over Jordan in the same way that their head passed over? And in like manner we read in Colossians, that it is as Head of the Church that Christ is "the first-born from the dead"—and surely, if he has the pre-eminence all his members shall share the priority too; else there would be one point in which Christ was not made like unto his brethren, and there would be a point in which the brethren were not fashioned like him.

Then the next question, and one of the deepest interest to ourselves, is, Who are those that will share in the first resurrection? Every man in his own order—Christ the first fruits, afterward them that are Christ's at his coming. Then, or next in order, "cometh the end." But Rev. 20 shows us that the resurrection of the just will antedate the resurrection of the unjust by at least one thousand years.

ON GUARD.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing April 21. Nehemiah 4: 6-23.

IT is a thrilling spectacle that this indomitable captain of ancient times describes in his matter-of-fact history. Miracle has disappeared from the record. The sun does not stand still, the iron axe-heads do not swim, there are no visits from angels; like a modern story of conflict, Nehemiah describes his undertaking, his difficulties and the means he undertook to overcome them. A wise, far-seeing, vigilant leader, he was, realizing to the full the strength and unscrupulousness of his foes and the weakness of his forces. In the emergency, he arms even his laborers and arranges a signal which summons every man to lay aside his tools and take up arms to fight. He shares the hardships with his men, sleeps in his clothes, that he may be ready for night attacks. Every form of danger is foreseen and plans formed to meet it. Yet this man is no irreligious man. He has strong faith in God and bids his men to remember that God is great and terrible and therefore they may fight with confidence. He does not expect God to work a miracle for his protection, but he counts on God blessing the efforts he makes. So in spite of the rubbish which blocks the way and in spite of the attacks of the foe, the building went on; difficulties are overcome as they appear and the business is finally finished. One admires this determined, persistent man, who was not daunted by obstacles, or threats, or ridicule, or open attacks. He had no difficulty in harmonizing faith and works. Like that modern general, who bade his men "trust in God and keep your powder dry," he used the means and looked to God to bless them.

Some of the noblest characters have been built up in storms of conflict, like that which surged against that old wall. We do not know how many around us are watching as well as working; we do not even know what foe our brother may be fighting. Some appetite, some old habit may be lurking near him perpetually, waiting a sign of weakness to dart upon him and break down the integrity of character he is slowly and faithfully building up among the rubbish of his old life. Some thankfully acknowledge that God takes away the old cravings, but that privilege is not enjoyed by all. With many, perpetual vigilance is the only means of safety. Life is a constant turmoil and the wall is built in troublous times. The struggle to pass a saloon, or a gambling-den, or a vicious resort, often costs a hard fight to a good man who has but recently started on the new life. He has to study how to fight his battle; he avoids certain streets; he begs the company of a Christian friend; he will not go out after nightfall; he will not look at certain books or pictures. Meanwhile, he prays earnestly for strength. So the battle goes on and his prayers are answered. God may do everything for a man in such a fight, but usually he expects the man to work out his own salvation.

KING'S DAUGHTERS IN OHIO.

We are asked to call attention to the approaching convention of King's Daughters at Toledo, O. The convention is to include all the circles of the State, which are numerous and enthusiastic. It will be held April 19-21. The object of the convention is to perfect the State organization, to adopt a State constitution and elect officers. The usual courtesies are extended to voting delegates, and reduced rates of board will be secured for visitors whom the Toledo members are unable to care for otherwise. All who expect to attend and have not already sent their names to Mrs. H. E. Simon, 370 Irving street, Toledo, should do so at once that accommodation may be secured.

An important feature of the convention will be the anniversary of the Students' Chapter. Circles have been formed in Ohio State University, in Ohio Wesleyan University, Shepardson College and Antioch College. All four institutions will send delegates, who will tell of the good work the Order has accomplished in their respective colleges. In each, the meetings are regularly held, there are devotional exercises and the girls discuss plans for helping others and for philanthropic work. Miss Ethel O. Blanfreid is President of this department in Wesleyan University and Miss Louise Herrick is President of the Students' Chapter.

AN ENTERPRISING Y. M. C. A.

One of the most remarkable instances of enterprise in Young Men's Christian Association work is to be seen at Mauch Chunk, Pa. Although the town contains a population of less than seven thousand there is an Association there which with its furniture and appliances is worth nearly seventy thousand dollars. The Association is only five years old, but from the beginning it has been most enthusiastically supported by members and friends. Its members increased so rapidly that in three years from its organization a new building was necessary and the project was so cordially received by the citizens, that funds for the land and building came in liberally and by the time the edifice was completed, only $12,000 remained to be paid of the $61,000 that had been expended and this has now been reduced to $8,000.

THE NEW BUILDING OF THE Y. M. C. A. AT MAUCH CHUNK, PA.

The new building of which we give a picture on this page is thus described by a correspondent of "The Young Men's Era":

The new building is a three-story structure, built in the colonial style of architecture, with a frontage on Broadway of seventy-five feet and a depth of sixty feet. The walls are of Ohio pressed brick, faced with Indiana limestone. The ground floor contains the secretary's office, reading room, director's room, which is also used for Bible classes, reception room, cloak room and lavatory. The auditorium, which has a seating capacity of 300 and is provided with theatre chairs, occupies the rear of this floor. On the second floor are the men's meeting room, members' parlor, ladies' auxiliary room, coat room, kitchen, china closet, etc. The third floor contains four class rooms, physical director's office, and the gymnasium, 31x74 feet in size, which is equipped with modern apparatus. Above this there is a roof garden which is used as a promenade, 75x30 feet in area. In the basement there is a swimming pool also bath rooms, bowling alleys, locker, and the heating plant for the building. The building is lighted throughout with incandescent electric lights. The interior wood work is oak finished, except the reception hall which is pure oak. All the rooms are handsomely and tastefully furnished.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

Rev. Dr. Nayler has been elected by the Book Committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church to succeed the lamented Dr. Liebhart as editor of the "Haus and Herd" and Secretary of the German branch of the Epworth League.

The Boston Baptist Ministers's Union at its recent meeting passed a resolution heartily approving the appointment of April 21, as Founders Day, and recommending pastors to adopt the suggestion of the B. Y. P. U. described on this page last week.

The Junior Christian Endeavor Society of the First Church, Chelsea., was the first to win one of the foreign badges offered by Mrs. Clark to the first societies that should report gifts to missions at least ten dollars more than the amount that they raised last year.

More than 700 delegates were registered at the recent convention of Epworth Leagues, Christian Endeavorers, &c., at Toronto, and at the great meeting over two thousand persons were present. Dr. S. A. Steel, of the Southern Epworth League, came North to take part in the convention.

The Baptist Union reports that the B. Y. P. U., connected with the First Baptist Church of Seattle, Wash., contributes $30 per year for the support of a Bible woman in India, pays half the rent of a mission Sunday School, furnishes a large part of the teachers in two mission schools and some in the Chinese and Japanese schools and is ready to help the pastor, W. F. Taylor, wherever he may direct.

At the great meeting of Christian Endeavorers on Boston Common during the International Convention, Dr. S. A. Smith, the author of America is to read his famous ode and it will afterwards be sung by the great assembly. Miss Helen M. Gould has defrayed the cost of preparing fifty thousand illuminated cards and music, which will be distributed at the convention to be kept as mementos.

An Australian young lady recently offered herself to the Foreign Missionary Board of her church as a missionary. The board was compelled to decline the offer, as its available funds were exhausted. Thereupon, the Christian Endeavor Society, of which she is a member, took the subject into consideration and subscribed sufficient money to pay her passage out and support her for a year.

The Family and Home Circle

Humble Mexican Homes.

Cottages of Straw and Mud in which the Poor, Uneducated Natives Live — Indians and Whites.

ALTHOUGH Mexican history and prowess has many glorious and beautiful passages, it is true, nevertheless, that in no other civilized country, on this side of the globe is the condition of the lower classes more degraded or pitiful. Our illustration shows a group of typical dwellings of the Mexican Indian or half-breed,—class which represents nearly seven millions of the republic's subjects. These houses are wretched hovels, constructed of cakes of clay, dried in the sun, or composed of a heterogeneous jumble of odds and ends like cane-stalk, planks, iron scraps, and matting.

Like our own Indians, the Indians of Mexico, for the most part, prefer the simple tent or the shelter of a blanket, to any more substantial structure. They are a race of ignorant and seemingly contented beings, with less ambition than the average nomad who changes his location to better himself. It is difficult to accept them as the descendants of the ancient Aztecs whom the Spanish invaders found in a high state of civilization, cultivated and intelligent, and their present degradation and apparent hopelessness tells more than could be told in printed volumes, how far has been the fall from that former splendor and greatness which dazzled the eyes and excited the cupidity of the adventurous soldiers and sailors from Southern Europe, beneath whose sharp swords the Aztecs perished in countless numbers.

But there are better days in store for the Mexican peasantry and the Indians. During the last decade, a system of public instruction has been established, which has already been productive of good results. Even the lowest ranks among the natives have progressed under the new and favorable conditions, and it is only a question of time when, with good government and continued effort in the right direction, the poor Mexican will become educated and enlightened sufficiently to take his place in the ranks of progressive humanity. The Gospel has still a great work to perform among these people, but under more liberal laws respecting religious toleration Christian missionaries have made substantial progress in many parts of the country. From time to time THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has published accounts of the cheering growth of their self-denying labors of love. There are still many obstacles, however, to Gospel teaching, chiefly owing to hostility on the part of the priests; but President Diaz, who is a broad-minded and liberal ruler, has favored concessions to Protestant missions, partly as a means of breaking down the barriers of ignorance and superstition which the native priesthood had striven to preserve, and which were the greatest menace to the country's progress and prosperity. One of the healthiest signs of the times in Mexico is the fact that the people themselves are beginning to appreciate the value of education and religious freedom.

A MEXICAN INDIAN FAMILY AT HOME.

The Influence of Example.

Every child should be early impressed with the importance of influencing others by the example of its own acts. In the home are tender little feet perhaps just beginning to walk alone, and whether we wish it or not, they turn with loving instinct after the big brother or sister, admiring their doings, coveting their gifts, repeating their words. In what direction are they leading them?

Coming home in the darkness one night, a child clung to its father's hand. "Listen, father," he said, "someone is following us." "I hear nothing, no one is following," answered the father. And then, partly to divert the child's mind and partly because a solemn truth glimmered through the words, the father made a little parable of them. "Somebody is always following you, my boy; as long as you live some footsteps follow yours. You cannot always hear them, you cannot always see them, but as the years go by the procession grows longer and longer, of those who are drawn by following you. Be sure that you do nothing that will lead them to do wrong, or that will make you regret that you did not show them a noble example."

A Pious Lad's Rebuke.

Rarely is a rebuke from a junior to an elder effective, yet it sometimes happens. In a street-car there were among the passengers an old man of eighty, a middle-aged woman, and a lad of sixteen. The aged man began a conversation with his neighbor. His talk was full of blasphemous curses and the fellow-passengers were horrified. Finally the youth put his hand upon the aged man's arm and said to him: "Sir, if you dearly loved a certain person, you would certainly be pained, if, in your presence, all manner of evil things were said of him." "Yes, indeed," replied the old man. The youth continued: "You have just spoken of one very dear to me in a manner that has hurt me exceedingly." The aged man rose to his feet and said: "I do not know anybody whom you love; I don't even know who you are." And the youth continued: "You have railed at our faithful Father in heaven to whom I was directed in my childhood, who has shown me many mercies and whom I dearly love. I am still a boy, but you, however, stand on the verge of the grave." He then took a Bible out of his pocket and placed it on the knees of the old man. A blush, not of wrath but of shame, colored the face of the latter. After a short pause he said with trembling voice: "Young man, I thank you for the lesson you have taught me. I shall never forget it."

A Little Chinese Bride.

A lady city missionary in New York, who was recently invited to a Chinese wedding in that city, gives this description of some things she saw on that occasion: "The little bride was arrayed in costly garments, the husband and all his men friends were in their best, laughing, talking and smoking, and she sitting on a stool in the corner of her bed-room not joining in the festivities. For three days she is not allowed to sleep nor to rest her body; she must from every one hide her head in shame. During the ceremony she must appear before ten witnesses, cousins of her husband. Each one in turn questions her and she must answer him in regard to her clothing, its cost, etc., where her gifts came from and in fact all her possessions are looked over, and she herself is brought into such publicity as would frighten even an American girl, much more a timid, little Chinese child. The husband gives great feasts to all his cousins, who are legion, and to his friends—of course the cost is great but usually he makes money by the transaction, for, as rapidly as the dishes are emptied at the table, the guests are expected to fill them with money wrapped in paper. It is contrary to custom to give anything as small as copper. The other day a great wedding feast was given here in Chinatown, the little bride having come on from Oregon to meet her husband whom she had never seen, and there were thirty-one tables spread at a cost of $20 per table—from that you can judge of the scale upon which they entertain at these feasts. But in all this display the little frightened, shrinking bride sits in her corner hiding her head in shame; the future is all unknown to her, her husband she knows not, nor what life with him may mean. There is no one to whom she may turn for sympathy."

A Child's Stand for Jesus.

At an afternoon meeting, the leader asked the children to arise who would stand by him and work for the Lord Jesus. In the home of a rich family this conversation took place later in the day between a little child and her mother: "Mamma, we've got to have a blessing asked at our table." "How so, my child?" "Well, I've promised to stand by the Lord and his work, and Mr. —— said that we must pray and thank God for our food, and I think I'll have to do it myself, as you don't and pa don't. So if you'll speak to pa about it, I'll ask the blessing." She did it about like this: "O Lord, bless us all, and have mercy upon us. There's father, he isn't a Christian; and there's mother, she isn't a Christian. Bless them. I've promised to stand by you in this work, and to stand by the meetings. Bless me! Amen." By the time the blessing was closed all eyes were filled with tears.

COMING HOME.

My ship is coming home; beside the breakers
That roll incessantly,
I catch the flutter, in the evening twilight,
Of sails across the sea.

And as I watch them drawing near and nearer,
With onward course and straight,
I wonder if the angels with such pleasure
For souls immortal wait.

Oh, do they stand there at the port of heaven
In high expectancy,
Ready to hail each home returning vessel
That comes across life's sea?

What pleasure, then, in sunset's glow and beauty,
With drooping sails to come,
And hear those angels singing in the harbor,
"Welcome, oh, welcome home!"

A CHILD'S READING.

So many inquiries are made by readers regarding the choice of books for their children, and especially with respect to the place fiction should occupy in the training, that these suggestions from the pen of Rev. H. C. Trumbull will be read with interest:

"There is a place for fiction in the matter of a child's reading. Good impressions can be made on a child's mind, and his feelings can be swayed in the direction of the right, by means of a story that is fictitious without being false. And thus it is that the average Sunday School library book has its mission in the work of child-training. But fiction ought not to be the chief factor in any child's reading, nor can influence and impressions take the place of instruction and information in the proper filling of his mind's treasure-chambers. Even if a child were to read only the best religious "story-books" which the world's literature proffers to him, this reading by itself would not tend to the development of his highest mental faculties, or to the fostering of his truest manhood. Unless he reads also that which adds to his stock of knowledge, and which gives him a fresh interest in the events and personages of the world's history, a child cannot obey the Divine injunction to grow in knowledge as well as in grace, and must certainly be the loser by his lack of this aid to character.

That a child is inclined by nature to prefer an amusing or an exciting story-book to a book of straightforward fact, everybody knows. But that is no reason why a child should follow his own unguided tastes in the matter of reading, any more than he should be permitted to indulge at all times his preference, in the realm of appelite, for sweet cakes instead of bread and butter, or for candies rather than meat and potatoes. "A Child left to himself causeth shame to his mother,"—and dishonor to himself, in one sphere of action as in another; and unless a parent cultivates a taste for right reading of every sort on a child's part, that child can never be at his best in the world, nor can his parents have such delight in his attainments as otherwise they might have.

A Good Child

is usually healthy, and both conditions are developed by use of proper food. The Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is the best infant's food: so easily prepared that improper feeding is inexcusable and unnecessary.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER IX.

A New Sorrow.

PERHAPS Alice would have faltered under the many trials and hardships of her lot if she had not been sustained by two hopes. When she was most discouraged the thought of Will in Mexico and of Fred on the high seas gave her new heart. She told herself that this struggle would end some day. Will might return to protect her and her mother, and be their support and comfort, or Fred might come back to claim her promise, and they would be married. Yes, it was only for a short time she would have to bear and dare; one or both of the dear, brave fellows would come back, and then all would be well.

But during those hard, gloomy days, one of those hopes had to be abandoned. A letter from New Mexico was put into her hands one day that crushed all hopes of Will's return, and very near crushed her heart, too. How could she tell her mother? She dreaded that ordeal. She felt she must gain strength before she could do that. Her mother would need comfort, and that Alice could not give until the agony of her own grief had abated. She postponed the sad duty for a day or two, and when she was ready to give her mother the news, Mrs. Mapleton was suffering from one of her nervous spells, and Alice, in mercy, postponed it again. But it proved to be no real mercy. One morning while Alice was engaged at Mrs. Wilson's house, an expressman delivered Will's trunks at the tenement house, and then Mrs. Mapleton realized what had occurred. With all its abruptness she suffered the blow that Alice intended should have fallen gradually and gently. It completely prostrated her, and for some days it was impossible to tell her the details.

About a week afterward, Mrs. Mapleton said: "Alice, my dear, I feel ever so much stronger this morning."

"I am so glad to hear you say that, my dear mother," said Alice. "I should like very much to tell you about poor Will."

"I think I can bear it now, and it will do me good to know the exact facts. What was he doing when we got his last letter?"

"He was draughtsman in the mine in which we have the stock; I suppose that means drawing the plans for the passages. You know he told us he had studied mine engineering and draughting—I think that was what he called it. Then he said he was getting a larger salary, and was saving money for mother and Sis, besides what he sent home; and that our stock was really valuable, and that we should be rich again some day."

"Yes, yes, but that day will never come now," sighed Mrs. Mapleton, "and now tell me what it was the good woman wrote to you about the end?"

"Shall I read her letter? I have read it a hundred times, and every time I read it I love the lady more than I did before," said Alice.

"Yes, dear, she must be a noble Christian lady, to write such a letter to a stranger, but don't read the letter; I think I can bear it better to hear it in your own words. But perhaps I am putting too much on you."

"No, mamma, I think it will do us both good to talk over these things and try to understand them. The kind lady said how sorry she was, having to write such a letter, for she had learned to love Will as if he was her own son, and that he was always speaking of his loving mother and his dear sister."

"Yes, dear, but how was it that the dear boy was killed. You have read the letter many times, you say. Try to make it so that I can understand its meaning."

"Why, mamma, it seems a band of savages made a raid on the settlement, and killed several people, and carried off a young mother and her two little girls. The people then organized a rescue party to go after the Indians, and poor Will was chosen leader. The letter says the Indians were lying in ambush, and opened fire upon them, killing and wounding almost the entire party, and when the dead were found in the mountain pass, they were beyond recognition, so were buried on the mountain side, and poor Will was one of the number."

"Poor boy! My own brave boy! I cannot realize it. Oh! I cannot think it is true. It is strange, all very, very strange, how could that good woman have known where to find us?"

"Why, she says that Will (in case anything should happen) left directions for her to write to you, and send his trunks, and also requested her to write to his friend in Mexico, Mr. Morgan."

"Morgan, Morgan, oh, yes; that must be your friend Fred. And is it not strange, that he should have deserted us, too?"

"No, no, never," cried Alice, "he never would desert a friend! how does he know where to find us? I have tried to hide from enemies and have only succeeded in putting myself beyond the reach of friends; but he will find us if he lives to return to this country, for he will know of our trouble when he gets the letter telling him of poor Will's death, and will come then."

"It may be so, my dear," said the mother. "I wronged him once and do not wish to do so again; indeed, since I have been getting stronger I have been thinking about myself, and my thoughts have not been pleasant. I see that I have been weak and even cowardly in my conduct. When I had everything I was selfish, and not as charitable to the poor nor considerate to the working people, as I should have been, and now, when all has been taken away, I am helpless and you alone are left to fight the battle."

"Well, mother, it is not too late to change all that. We cannot give money now, but we can help them by personal kindness, and I think everyone likes that best. Since I have been a poor girl, I have learned to appreciate kind words. I should resent a gift in charity but kindness is to my heart like a gentle rain on parched ground. I think that was what made the people love Jesus so, his being among them and being kind to them."

"Ah, my dear, you know more of the Bible than I do. I wish I had read it more. I have sadly neglected it, but I mean to read it. I wanted to read it the other day, but I could not find the family Bible. I could find only your small one and that hurts my eyes, the print is so small. I wish you would find the large Bible and put it where I can use it when I want. Get it now, my dear, and read a chapter."

Poor Alice! The Bible was in Mr. Jacobs' hands. It was richly bound, and had gold clasps, so it had followed her trinkets to the kind pawnbroker's.

"I will look, mother, but not now," she said, trying to hide her embarrassment. "I will get poor Will's Bible out of his trunk. We must school ourself to the sight of dear Will's things; I think you will like to read out of his Bible. I will get it now."

She went to the trunk and bringing the book seated herself at the table. Slipping off the elastic band with which it was bound, she opened the precious volume, but she had no sooner done so than she started up in amazement and exclaimed, "Oh! mother, look at this!"

"What is it, dear?" asked the mother in some alarm, the tears running down her cheeks at the sight of the book.

"Why! mamma, here is a five-dollar-bill, and here is a card with 'Mother's Saving Bank' written on it, and here is another bill! Oh! Mother, in our darkest hour, I have tried to hide it from you, but we were without a dollar, and that this should come just at the time when such help is so much needed! No; we are not forsaken."

She turned the leaves one by one each time bringing forth a bill, until at last she had twenty-five, and each of the value of five dollars. This was too much for poor, tired, worried Alice; and she threw her arms around her Mother's neck and burst into tears.

"That's what the dear boy meant when he said he was saving for his Mother," said Mrs. Mapleton, as she wiped the tears from her face.

Poor Alice slept sounder that night than she had for weeks.

CHAPTER X.

A Plot.

"Goot mornin', Mrs. Callaghan," said Mr. Jacobs, as she was passing his shop. "Vot was dot I hear 'bout you was moast drown a fellow de udder day?"

"I hope he was no friend of yours, Misther Jacobs, and if he has been afther tellin' ye that he didn't desarve all he got, don't believe a word of it. Och! if ye only saw the swate young creature he was insultin', shure and ye'd ha' done it yourself."

"Vell, maybe, but I could not do it so goot as vat you vas do it. Vas it dirty vater?"

"Well, bedad, it wasn't very clane."

"Oh, dot vas goot," and Mr. Jacobs began rubbing his hands together while walking rapidly up and down the floor—"and it vent on top of his hat?"

"Yes, sur, right on top of his shiny hat, and, begorra, it gave him as good a ducking as his mother ever gave him, for it went over his eves, and down his back."

Mrs. Callaghan seemed for the first time to see the comic side of the picture she was painting in her own way, for she began to laugh heartily, and Mr. Jacobs was doubled up and rubbing his hands together.

"Oh, yes, yes, go on; and his goot clothes? Oh, dey must looks nice!"

"Shure now, he looked loike a half-drowned kitten, that ye' 'ed taken from a tub o' suds and held up by the schruff o' the neck."

"Oh, dot vas goot; dot vas better as goot. Now, Mrs. Callaghan, you shall have dot door put in dot partition vot you vas vanted some time already, and min't dot, Mrs. Callaghan, you always have von bucket of vater ready, and ven dot fellow come pack some more to botter dot poor child, you yoost give it to him."

"Och, niver fear, sur; I'll be on the watch for the ugly spalpeen, an' if he iver insults her agin, shure, oi'll be ready for him."

Mrs. Callaghan then went on her way, saying to herself, "well, if he is a Jew, he's got a good heart. I wish more Christians was loike him."

That evening a young girl, her face covered with a dark veil, stood looking into Mr. Jacobs' shop window; while on the opposite side of the street could be seen the form of a man who appeared as if watching the movements of the girl. The man would walk to the end of the block, and then retrace his steps, all the time keeping his eye upon the figure standing by the Jew's window, and although his coat collar was turned up about his ears, and the rim of his soft felt hat pulled down to his eves, it was easy for anyone acquainted with the person to recognize a striking resemblance to the form of Mr. Jackson. The girl watched until Mr. Jacobs left the shop, and went to partake of his evening meal, leaving his son to take his place behind the counter; then she entered and in a trembling voice, asked for a loan on a bracelet.

"How much you vant?" asked the young Jacobs as he examined the trinket.

"Only two dollars," said the girl.

"But this is a valuable article, I s'pose it's all right; you come py it honestly?"

"Oh, yes," said the girl,—although she was trembling from head to foot.

Young Jacobs noticed her agitation, and therefore eyed her closely. He could not make out her features until he obtained a peep under her veil, when she signed the name, "Alice Mapleton."

When she had received her two dollars, with an accompanying pawn-ticket, she hurriedly left the shop and was joined by the man, who had in the meantime crossed the street. Handing him the pawn-ticket she was much agitated, and when they separated at the corner she said, "I am afraid I have done a dreadful thing for you. You must surely keep your promise?"

"Yes, yes," said the man in a suppressed and impatient voice; "but remember, not a word about this, or you will find yourself in a dreadful scrape,"

"And you?" asked the girl.

"Oh, well, you see, I had nothing to do with it."

"What do you mean?" she said, at the same time stopping abruptly. "Didn't you tell me? Didn't I do it to please you, and for no other purpose?"

"There, there; don't talk so loud, I only wanted you to see that it is necessary to your own interests to keep a closed mouth, come what may."

"I have not the slightest idea as to why you have asked me to do this thing, but I do hope that it is not to injure an innocent person," said the girl.

"Can you not trust me, he asked; "have I not placed the greatest confidence in you?"

"I don't know," she answered in a weary and sad tone of voice, "I once trusted you with my whole heart, and have I not sacrificed everything for you? Even home, friends and honor" (this last word came with a sob), "but you have not kept your promise to me, sometimes I fear you will never do so; in the end you will desert me. You come to me with nice words, and make me believe you, and for a short time I am happy, then you get indifferent again. Oh, if you do prove false after all you have promised, and after all I have given up for you, I shall die; I shall kill myself, I know!"

"Now, don't get excited! don't talk in such a foolish way, or you will make me angry," said the man. "You must not doubt my faithfulness, I have explained to you why I cannot marry at present. And I think you had better make up with your people, and return to your home; then you can remain there for a short time—until I am ready to come after you."

"Never!" cried the girl. "The loved ones whom I deserted for you, shall never see me again, until they see me as your wife, or in my coffin."

"I wish you would not be so confoundedly foolish, nor talk such a lot of nonsense," said the man, now growing quite angry; then checking himself he continued, "There, there—don't cry—I am worried and out of sorts, it will be all right, trust me, and then as you say, you will be happy all the time, but I must leave you now. Remember, not a word; leave all to me, or it will be worse for both of us. Good-night."

"No, no, I cannot let you leave me so," said the girl, following him and taking hold of his arm. "I shall lose my senses if I have nothing to think of till I see you again but your threats and harshness. Do you not understand that I have staked my all on your truth. If you are false to me, what am I? I lie awake half the night sometimes, thinking over my position. When I feel sure that you are true and faithful, and mean to keep your promise, then I am content. I grieve for all I have given up for your sake, but I do not fret, as I know that being your wife will make up for all. But when you speak harshly, and when I think I see in your manner signs that you are tired of me and will be likely to cast me off, then I am almost a maniac I thought that when I did this thing to oblige you, I should have had kind words at any rate. I was reluctant to do it, but I consented, as I have done in other things because I love you and want to please you But all I have from you is taunts and threat. Oh! oh! I shall go crazy."

The woman's voice rose almost to a shriek. People on the street turned to look at her and wondered if a quarrel was in progress.

"Hush," said the man, "don't make a scene on the street. I have told you again and again that I intend to marry you when I am able. You weary me by these perpetual doubts. Now be a good, sensible girl, as you used to be, in the old days."

He turned down an unfrequented street talking to her soothingly and caressingly till she grew more calm. Her hysterical manner disappeared under the spell of his voice, but she clung convulsively to his arm and her frame now and again shook with a violent sob. All this was very unexpected to the man and he was deeply annoyed by it. He would have liked to fling her aside, or get rid of her somehow, but not at the cost of a scandal. He had never seen anything like this in her before and he realized for the first time that this quiet docile creature might make a great deal of trouble for him if she became desperate That was a new factor in the combination which must not be overlooked. He must think it out. Meanwhile she must be calmed and reassured and afterward he would decide how to act.

THE LAST OF THE OLD GUARD.*

BUT one last effort to stem the torrent still remained. If the British centre could be broken, and their advance checked, some favorable chance was just possible. The Emperor therefore ordered the advance of the reserve infantry of e Imperial Guard,—the flower of his ar-v. He exhorted them, by a hasty person-appeal, and confided the direction of their forts to "the bravest of the brave," who ad had five horses killed under him and ho now advanced on foot, sword in hand. he 2900 stalwarts moved forward in two lumns, headed by Ney, and supported by heavy fire of artillery, while four battal-ns of the Old Guard, formed into squares, ok post in their rear as a reserve and to otect the march of the columns.

Either wing of the English line had by is time advanced in consequence of the pulses of the French and their line now esented a concave .They were formed in unbroken array, four deep, and as the rench advanced poured on them a shower hich never intermitted, each man firing as ten as he could reload. Wellington gave e order to advance in the familiar and usque terms of, "Up guards and at em!" The English wings kept moving all the while; and when the heads of e French column which continued to ad-ance till within forty or fifty yards, ap-oached to this point, they were met with ch a storm of musketry in front, and on her flank, that they in vain endeavored deploy into line for the attack, under a rriffic and unremitting fire. They stopped make this attempt, reeled, lost order, and e eight hundred men who were left stand-g fled at last in one mass of confusion.

The Duke of Wellington now dismount-, placed himself at the head of his line d led them against the remaining num-rs of four battalions of the Old Guard—e only unbroken troops remaining behind, hile Ney was striving to rally his fugi-tives. His cocked hat was gone, and his clothes were literally riddled with bullets, though he himself remained untouched. The intrepid marshal, at Wellington's approach, took part once more in the melee, sword in hand, and on foot. But nothing could withstand the impetuous assault of the victorious British.

Napoleon, who had watched this last terrible contest from the heights of La Belle Alliance suddenly exclaimed, "They are mingled together, all is lost for the present," and accompanied by only three or four officers, he gave the signal for retreat and hurried to the left of Planchenois, to a second position, where he had placed a regiment of the Guard, with two batteries in reserve. The four battalions of the Old Guard, under General Cambronne, still remained to protect the retreat of the French army. The Duke of Wellington now ordered his whole line to advance and attack their position. They advanced to the charge in embattled array, condensed and tremendous, against the remnant of noble veterans.

The Old Guard was destroyed,—not defeated! The advancing British troops rode over their prostrate bodies piled in ghastly heaps,—a monument to their valor and heroism, even in death.

HOW THEY CAME TO CHRIST.

Bowery Mission Converts Who Were Rescued From the Very Depths of Sin.

HARDLY a night passes at which the story of some lost one, newly reclaimed, is not told at the Gospel meetings held at the Bowery Mission. Many of the experiences related there are intensely dramatic and instructive. Among the latest were these:

A young man from Chicago who, through evil associations, was leading a wild life, thought to escape his surroundings by a change of residence. On leaving home, he promised his mother that he would do better. Reaching New York, he kept his promise for a few days, and then gave way to his former desires, visiting music halls and dance halls until his money was all gone. Passing the Bowery Mission, he heard the singing, entered and was saved. He is now steadily employed, sends his money home to his mother and testifies gladly to the glory of God.

A young man at one time engaged in the drug business, had become addicted to the use of morphine and liquor. Having lost employment and friends through his vices, he was wandering in hopeless despair upon the Bowery. Such was his condition that, as he afterwards admitted, he never dreamed that there was any power that could deliver him from his appetites and habits. Entering the Mission out of curiosity, he listened with surprise to the testimonies of men who had been rescued from similar vices. At last he was thoroughly convinced and led to believe and was himself redeemed. He now testifies gladly of the saving grace that won him to Christ. He is steadily employed, industrious and happy.

A professor of music and composer had through dissipated habits, lost friends and social position, and at last drifted penniless to the Bowery. Passing the mission one Sunday morning, he entered. The organist was absent, and when the leader called for a volunteer musician from the audience, the newcomer responded. He soon became interested in the services, conviction of sin followed, and he accepted the Saviour.

Vice and intemperance had ruined a resident of Boston. He had fled from his former home, deserting wife and children. He entered the Bowery Mission listlessly at first; but he continued to come, and during the next eight days it became evident that he was undergoing an internal struggle. He finally accepted salvation, and is now living the life of a redeemed man. He is steadily employed, and rapidly winning back the valued friendships he had alienated by his former sinful follies.

Several readers have sent their names and address to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to be enrolled as patrons of the Bowery Mission. Others will be welcomed.

TROUBLE.

WHEN in times of hardest test,
We'll remember God knows best;
For 'tis he has promised rest,
Even to the sinfulest.

So we'll try to do his will,
Trust his grace and serve him still,
That in us he may instil
Meek submission to his will.

Friends he may asunder part,
But he'll not refuse our heart;
And if we but make the start,
Gracious strength will he impart.

Thus when we are sorely tried,
We will in our Lord confide;
For to us there's none beside
Jesus Christ, who for us died.

COMFORT IN A CLOUD.

A benevolent gentleman paid a visit to a poor woman who, though overwhelmed with troubles, yet always seemed cheerful. "You have many dark days," said he. "Yes," she replied, "but I often find there's comfort in a cloud." "Comfort in a cloud?" "Yes, when I am very low and dark I go to the window and if I see a heavy cloud, I think of those precious words: 'A cloud received him out of their sight;' and I look up and see the cloud still enough, and then I think—well, that must be the cloud that hides him, and so I see there is comfort in a cloud."

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful-curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

Every one knows persons troubled with indigestion or dyspepsia. The total number of such cases is exceeded only by the number of "cures" offered. These "cures" have one uniform feature—that is, "take something"—a pill, pellet, powder or potion; and there actually are people to-day endeavoring to cure dyspepsia by taking such nostrums.

One Way

There is however, a better way to cure indigestion, and that is by way of the food—not by avoiding food but by preparing it so that it need not be avoided. There's nothing more certain than that food prepared with Cottolene instead of lard loses its "richness," as we commonly call the property which causes indigestion.

This Way!

In which way is your food prepared, with lard or with Cottolene? The difference is greater than you may realize.

Right Way?

Every member of the household is benefited when Cottolene is used, but the dyspeptic most of all.

Cottolene is sold everywhere in one, three, and five pound tins, with the trade mark—steer's head in cotton-plant wreath on every package. Get the genuine. Made only by advertised for many years, but have you ever tried it? If not, you do not know what an IDEAL COMPLEXION POWDER IS.

POZZONI'S

besides being an acknowledged beautifier, has many refreshing uses. It prevents chafing, sun-burn, wind-tan, lessens perspiration, etc.; in fact it is a most delicate and desirable protection to the face during hot weather. It is sold everywhere.

REV. DR. DEEMS' SUCCESSOR.

FOR many years few places of worship in New York were better known than the Church of the Strangers on Mercer street, where for almost a generation the late Rev. Charles Force Deems was the beloved pastor. The church is an undenominational and independent Christian church, yet affiliating with all evangelical denominations, and its membership is made up from all. It was long a distinct spiritual force in the community and its members were engaged in many good works. Its spiritual affairs are controlled by the pastor and an advisory committee of eleven members, and during twenty years under this simple organization, the utmost harmony and concord have existed in the church.

Lately, the Church of the Strangers extended a call to Rev. Daniel A. Blackburn of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Charleston, S. C., and this young and talented preacher—like his predecessor, a consecrated Southerner—assumed his new duties on March 24. He is about thirty years of age, and a native of Tennessee. Last fall, while visiting New York, he attended a prayer-meeting at the Church of the Strangers, and his remarks at that time made so deep an impression upon his hearers that they resolved to have the stranger for their pastor, if possible. Inquiries were made and soon the brilliant young preacher was summoned to his new and larger field, a triumph won through a few heartfelt words, spoken without preparation, but which revealed to those who heard them, the deep spirituality and earnestness of the man who uttered them.

There has been no regular pastor of the Church of the Strangers since a year before the death of the late incumbent. A portrait of the new pastor appears on this page.

A SOUTHERN REVIVAL.

Rev. R. G. Pearson's Meetings at Knoxville, led to a widespread revival. A Knoxville pastor writes that "the whole city was moved. Hundreds of people were blessed and many scores of souls have confessed Christ. The meetings were a great blessing to the churches of the city, awakening them, lifting higher the standard of Christian living, and reclaiming many who had gone astray."

A House Afire.

That's what our bodies are. If they didn't keep us warm o spirits would move out. The flame of health must burn just so there's disease and death. Electropoise keeps up the supply of oxyg (the fuel for the flame) and so is of universal application, bringi relief and cure where all else has failed. Here are two widely diff ing disorders and yet Electropoise is curing both.

22 William St., NEW YORK, December 28, 1893.

I take pleasure in certifying to the curative powers of the Electropoise, in which I was a disbeliever, and very reluctantly consented to make a test of it. It cured me of insomnia of many years' standing, on account of which I was also suffering from nervous prostration and enfeebled digestion. Yours truly, P. A. LEMAN,
(of Henry Hentz & Co.)

BROOKLYN, N. Y., December 14, 1894.

Being asked to give my opinion as to the efficacy of the "Electropoise," I most cheerfully do so, premising that I have used it but a few weeks. For four years I have suffered from eczema, which has been very vexatious, sometimes in the face, hands and in the feet. After trying other "cures" which did not cure, this new remedy is curing it, but only by degrees. Being a little advanced in years and consequently, not as vigorous, I find my bodily strength increased evidently by its use. (Signed)
A. D. MATTHEWS,

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON

QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

÷ MODENE ÷

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In Compounding, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing off what it was discovered that the hair was entirely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. Its safety put free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts quickly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without the slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps receive the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) Cut this advertisement out.

PEACE DAWNS IN THE EAST.

A Armistice Between China and Japan Follows the Wounding of Li Hung Chang—Cost of the War—The Outcome to Christianity.

LI HUNG CHANG.

WITH the arrival of spring, comes the welcome news that the war between China and Japan has temporarily halted, the victorious Mikado having consented to a truce. After half a year of fighting, China found herself completely at the mercy of her despised antagonist, her fleet captured, her boasted armies scattered like chaff, and her maritime strongholds in the enemy's possession. To crown her humiliation, China's capital was threatened from two sides, and the young Emperor was in danger of being made a prisoner or compelled to become a fugitive.

It is not necessary now to review the events of this remarkable war, in which the smaller power triumphed through the adoption of modern methods, as opposed to the anti-quated systems of the Chinese.

All the world knows the story of Japan's sudden rise, from the position of an inferior and semi-tributary power, to both dignity and importance of a great leader among Asiatic nations, sovereign and independent. That Japan's success is due even more to her mental and intellectual progress, than to her splendid military skill, may well be urged. When the dispute with China over Korea arose last year, the Mikado and his ministers stood firmly on the side of the impoverished and misgoverned Koreans, and advocated better laws and a purer administration of public affairs. China, on the other hand, contended for her old-time supremacy over her vassal, Korea, and cared nothing for the welfare of the people. Count Hiroumbi Ito, the Mikado's Prime Minister, who has contributed more than any other leader in Japan to the progress of the Empire, organized the general plan of operations in Korea and afterwards in Manchuria. To his brain is due, therefore, in a large measure that wonderful strategic skill, which, carried out by such able generals as Oyama and Nodzu has made the Japanese armies seem to be almost invincible in the present war.

Count Ito belongs to an old aristocratic family and served in the army of the Shogun, the former ruler. He has had an influential voice in the affairs of his country for many years, and is regarded as a great statesman as well as a brilliant general. Early in his career, he became alive to the fact that the new civilization was to come from the West, and he was not slow to adopt in Japan many Western reforms, with the result that his country quickly assumed the lead in all that related to substantial progress, civilized customs, popular education, industrial development, public morals and time and labor-saving inventions. As a fitting climax, the army and navy were organized on the Western model, and little Japan stood fully equipped, awaiting her destiny. During the past six months, she has been making history very rapidly, and by a series of unbroken successes, has reduced the great Mongol Empire to the attitude of a suppliant, craving peace and willing to pay heavily for it. This was the position of affairs, when, a few weeks ago, Japan consented to receive a Chinese peace embassy. The ambassadors came, but their credentials were fatally defective and the war went on. On their return to China, their failure determined the government to commission the famous veteran, China's greatest soldier and statesman, Li Hung Chang, as its new peace

EASTER JUBILEE.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., preached last Sunday on the Text: I.Cor. 15: 54, "Death is swallowed up in victory."

ABOUT eighteen hundred and sixty-one Easter mornings have wakened the earth. In France for three centuries the almanacs made the year begin at Easter, until Charles IX. made the year begin at January 1st. In the Tower of London there is a royal pay-roll of Edward I., on which there is an entry of eighteen pence for four hundred colored and pictured Easter eggs, with which the people sported. In Russia slaves were fed and alms were distributed at Easter.

Ecclesiastical councils met in Pontus, in Gaul, in Rome, in Achaia, to decide the particular day, and, after a controversy more animated than gracious, decided it, and now through all Christendom in some way, the first Sunday after the full moon which happens upon or next after March 21 is filled with Easter rejoicing. The royal court of the Sabbaths is made up of fifty-two. Fifty-one are princes in the royal household; but Easter is queen. She wears a richer diadem, and sways a more jewelled sceptre, and in her smile nations are irradiated. We welcome this queenly day, holding high up in her right hand the wrenched-off bolt of Christ's sepulchre, and holding high up in her left hand the key to all the cemeteries in Christendom.

My text is an ejaculation. It is spun out of hallelujahs. Paul wrote right on in his argument about the resurrection, and observed all the laws of logic; but when he came to write the words of the text his fingers and his pen and the parchment on which he wrote took fire, and he cried out, "Death is swallowed up in victory!" It is a dreadful sight to see an army routed and flying. They scatter everything valuable on the track. Unwheeled artillery. Hoof of horse on breast of wounded and dying man. You have read of the French falling back from Sedan, or Napoleon's track of ninety thousand corpses in the snow-banks of Russia, or of the five kings tumbling over the rocks of Bethoran with their armies, while the hail-storms of heaven and the swords of Joshua's hosts struck them with their fury. But in my text is a worse discomfiture. It seems that a black giant proposed to conquer the earth. He gathered for his host all the aches and pains and maladies and distempers and epidemics of the ages. He marched them down, drilling them in the north-east wind, amid the slush of tempests. He threw up barricades of grave-mound. He pitched tent of charnel-house. Some of the troops marched with slow tread, commanded by consumptions; some in double-quick, commanded by pneumonia. Some [illegible] engagement of evil habit and some by one stroke of the battle-axe of casualty. With bony hand he pounded at the doors of hospitals and sick-rooms, and won all the victories in all the great battle-fields of all the five continents. Forward, march! the conqueror of conquerors, and all the generals and commanders-in-chief, and all presidents and kings and sultans and czars drop under the feet of his war charger.

But one Christmas night his antagonist was born. As most of the plagues and sicknesses and despotisms came out of the East, it was appropriate that the new conqueror should come out of the same quarter. Power is given him to awaken all the fallen of all the centuries and of all lands, and marshal them against the black giant. Fields have already been won, but the last day will see the decisive battle. When Christ shall lead forth his two brigades, the brigade of the risen dead and the brigade of the celestial host, the black giant will fall back, and the brigade from the riven sepulchres will take him from beneath, and the brigade of descending immortals will take him from above, and "death shall be swallowed up in victory." The old braggart that threatened the conquest and demolition of the planet has lost his throne, has lost his sceptre, has lost his palace, has lost his prestige, and the one word written over all the gates of mausoleum and catacomb and necropolis, on cenotaph and sarcophagus, on the lonely cairn of the Arctic explorer and on the catafalque of great cathedral, written in capitals of azalea and calla lily, written in musical cadence, written in doxology of great assemblages, written on the sculptured door of the family vault, is "Victory." Coronal word, embannered word, apocalyptic word, chief word of triumphal arch under which conquerors return. Victory! Word shouted at Culloden and Balaklava and Blenheim; at Megiddo and Solferino; at Marathon, where the Athenians drove back the Medes; at Poictiers, where Charles Martel broke the ranks of the Saracens; at Salamis, where Themistocles in the great sea-fight confounded the Persians, and at the door of the Eastern cavern of chiselled rock, where Christ came out through a recess and throttled the King of Terrors, and put him back in the niche from which the celestial Conqueror had just emerged. Aha! when the jaws of the Eastern mausoleum took down the black giant, "death was swallowed up in victory."

I proclaim the abolition of death. The old antagonist is driven back into mythology with all the lore about Stygian ferry and Charon with oar and boat. We shall have no more to do with death than we have with the cloak-room at a Governor's or President's levee. We stop at such cloak-room and leave in charge of the servant our overcoat, our overshoes, our outward apparel, that we may not be impeded in the brilliant round of the drawing-room. Well, my friends, when we go out of this world we are going to a King's banquet, and to a reception of monarchs, and at the door of the tomb we leave the cloak of flesh and the wrappings with which we meet the storms of the world. At the close of our earthly reception, under the brush and broom of the porter, the coat or hat may be handed to us better than when we resigned it, and the cloak of humanity will finally be returned to us improved and brightened and purified and glorified. You and I do not want our bodies returned to us as they are now. We want to get rid of all their weaknesses, and all their susceptibilities to fatigue, and all their slowness of locomotion. They will be put through a chemistry of soil and heat and cold and changing seasons out of which God will reconstruct them as much better than they are now as the body of the rosiest and healthiest child that bounds over the lawn is better than the sickest patient in the hospital.

But as to our soul, we will cross right over, not waiting for obsequies, independent of obituary, into a state in every way better, with wider room and velocities beyond computation; the dullest of us into companionship with the very best spirits in their very best moods, in the very best room of the universe, the four walls furnished and panelled and pictured and glorified with all the splendors that the infinite God in all ages has been able to invent. Victory!

This view, of course, makes if of but little importance whether we are cremated or sepultured. If the latter is dust to dust, the former is ashes to ashes. If any prefer incineration, let them have it without caricature. The world may become so crowded that cremation may be universally adopted by law as well as by general consent. Many of the mightiest and best of earth have gone through this process. Thousands and tens of thousands of God's children have been cremated. P. P. Bliss and wife, the evangelist singers, cremated by accident at Ashtabula Bridge. John Rogers cremated by persecution; Latimer and Ridley cremated at Oxford; Pothinus, and Blondina, a slave, and Alexander, a physician, and their comrades, cremated at the order of Marcus Aurelius. At least a hundred thousand of Christ's disciples cremated, and there can be no doubt about the resurrection of their bodies. If the world lasts as much longer as it has already been built, there perhaps may be no room for the large acreage set apart for resting-places, but that time has not come. Plenty of room yet, and the race need not pass that bridge of fire until it comes to it. The most of us prefer the old way. But whether out of natural disintegration or cremation we shall get that luminous buoyant, gladsome, transcendent, magnificent, inexplicable structure called the resurrection body, you will have it, I will have it. I say to you to-day, as Paul said to Agrippa, "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?"

That far-up cloud, higher than the hawk flies, higher than the eagle flies, what is it made of? Drops of water from the Hudson, other drops from East River, other drops from a stagnant pool out on Newark Flats. Up yonder there, embodied in a cloud and the sun kindles it. If God can make such a lustrous cloud out of water-drops, many of them soiled and impure, and fetched from miles away, can he not transport the fragments of a human body from the earth, and out of them build a radiant body? Cannot God, who owns all the material out of which bones, and muscle, and flesh are made, set them up again if they have fallen? If a manufacturer of telescopes drop a telescope on the floor and it breaks, can he not mend it again so you can see through it? And if God drops the human eye into the dust, the eye which he originally fashioned, can he not restore it? Aye, if the manufacturer of the telescope, by a change of the glass and a change of focus, can make a better glass than that which was originally constructed, and actually improve it, do you not think the fashioner of the human eye may improve its sight and multiply the natural eye by the thousandfold additional forces of the resurrection eye?

"Why should it be thought with you an incredible thing that God should raise the dead?" Things all around us suggest it. Out of what grew all these flowers? Out of the mould and earth. Resurrected. Resurrected. The radiant butterfly, where did it come from? The loathsome caterpillar. That albatross that smites the tempest with its wing, where did it come from? A senseless shell. Near Bergerac, France, in a Celtic tomb, under a block, were found flower seeds that had been buried two thousand years. The explorer took the flower seed and planted it, and it came up, it bloomed in bluebell and heliotrope. Two thousa years ago buried, yet resurrected. A tra eller says he found in a mummy pit Egypt garden peas that had been buri there three thousand years ago. He broug them out, and on June 4, 1844, he plant them, and in thirty days they sprang Buried three thousand years, yet res rected.

"Why should it be thought a thing credible with you that God should ra the dead?" Where did all this silk co from? the silk that adorns your persons a your homes? In the hollow of a staf Greek missionary brought from China Europe the progenitors of those wor that now supply the silk markets of ma nations. The pageantry of bannered h and the luxurious articles of commer emporium blazing out from the silkworr And who shall be surprised if out of this significant earthly life our bodies unfold to something worthy of the coming eter ties. Put silver into diluted nitre an dissolves. Is the silver gone forever? Put in some pieces of copper and the sil reappears. If one force dissolves, anot force reorganizes.

"Why should it be thought a thing credible with you that God should raise dead?" The insects flew and the wor crawled last autumn feebler and feeb and then stopped. They have taken food, they want none. They lie dorm and insensible, but soon the south wind blow the resurrection trumpet, and the and the earth will be full of them. Do not think that God can do as much for bodies as he does for the wasps, and spiders and the snails? This morning half-past four o'clock there was a res rection. Out of the night, the day. I few weeks there will be a resurrection in our gardens. Why not some day a res rection amid all the graves? Ever a anon there are instances of men and w en entranced. A trance is death, follow by resurrection after a few days. T suspension of mental power and volunt action. Rev. William Tennent—a gr evangelist of the last generation, of wh Dr. Archibald Alexander, a man far fr being sentimental, wrote in most eulogi terms—Rev. William Tennent seemed die. His spirit seemed to have depart People came in day after day and s "He is dead; he is dead." But the s returned, and William Tennent lived write out experiences of what he had s while his soul was gone. It may be fo some time that what is called suspen animation or comatose state is brief de giving the soul an excursion into the r world, from which it comes back—a lough of a few hours granted from the flict of life to which it must return.

Do not this waking up of men f trance, and this waking up of grains bu three thousand years ago, make it ea for you to believe that your body mine, after the vacation of the grave, s rouse and rally, though there be three t sand years between our last breath and sounding of the archangelic reveille? P siologists tell us that while the most of bodies are built with such wonderful ec my that we can spare nothing, and the of a finger is a hindrance, and the injur a toe-joint makes us lame, still we have or three apparently useless physical appa and no anatomist or physiologist has been able to tell what they are good Perhaps they are the foundation of the urrection body, worth nothing to us in state, to be indispensably valuable in next state. The Jewish rabbis appea have had a hint of this suggestion w they said that in the human frame there a small bone which was to be the basi the resurrection body. That may been a delusion. But this thing is cer the Christian scientists of our day found out that there are two or three su fluities of the body that are something riously suggestive of another state.

I called at my friend's house one sum day. I found the yard all piled up rubbish of carpenter's and mason's w

T door was off. The plumbers had torn up the floor. The roof was being lifted in cupola. All the pictures were gone and the paper-hangers were doing their work. All the modern improvements were being introduced into that dwelling. There was not a room in the house fit to live in at the time, although a month before when I visited that house everything was so beautiful I could not have suggested an improvement.

My friend had gone with his family to the Holy Land, expecting to come back at the end of six months, when the building was to be done. And oh! what was his joy when at the end of six months he returned and the old house was enlarged and improved and glorified. That is your body. It looks well now. All the rooms filled with health, and we could hardly make a suggestion. But after awhile your soul will go to the Holy Land, and while you are gone that old house of your tabernacle will be entirely reconstructed from cellar to attic; every nerve, muscle, and bone and tissue and artery must be hauled over, and the old structure will be burnished and adorned and raised and cupolaed and enlarged, and all the improvements of heaven introduced, and you will move into it on Resurrection Day. "For we know that, if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Oh, what a day when body and soul meet again! They are very fond of each other. Did your body ever have a pain and your soul sympathize with it, or echo it? Or, changing the question, did your soul ever have any trouble and your body not sympathize with it, growing faint and weak under the depressing influence? Or, did your soul ever have a gladness but your body celebrated it with kindling eye and cheek and elastic step. Surely, God never intended two such good friends to be very long separated. And so when the world's last Easter morning shall come, the soul will descend, crying, "Where is my body?" and the body will ascend, saying, "Where is my soul?" and the Lord of the resurrection will bring them together and it will be a perfect soul in a perfect body, introduced by a perfect Christ into a perfect heaven. Victory!

Only the bad disapprove of the resurrection. A cruel heathen warrior heard Mr. Moffat, the missionary, preach about the resurrection, and he said to the missionary, "Will my father rise in the last day?" "Yes," said the missionary. "Will all the dead in battle rise?" said the cruel chieftain. "Yes." said the missionary. "Then," said the warrior, "let me hear no more about the resurrection day. There can be no resurrection, there shall be no resurrection. I have slain thousands in battle. Will they rise?"

Oh! there will be more to rise on that day than those want to see whose crimes have never been repented of. But for all others who allowed Christ to be their salvation, and life, and resurrection, it will be a day of victory. The thunders of the last day will be the salvo that greets you into honor. The lightnings will be only the torches of triumphal procession marching down to escort you home. The burning worlds flashing through immensity will be the rockets celebrating your coronation on the thrones, where you will reign forever, and forever, and forever. Where is death? What have we to do with death? As your reunited body and soul swing off from this planet on that last day, you will see deep gashes all up and down the hills, deep gashes through the valleys, and they will be the emptied graves, they will be the abandoned sepulchres, with rough ground tossed on either side of them, and slabs will lie uneven on the rent hillocks, and there will be fallen monuments and cenotaphs, and then for the first time you will appreciate the full exhilaration of the text, "He will swallow up death in victory."

Hail the Lord of earth and heaven!
Praise to thee by both be given;
Thee we greet triumphant now,
Hail the resurrection Thou!

Peace Dawns in the East.

envoy. Li, who in the early stages of the war had been unjustly deprived of his military rank and decorations and disgraced by his Emperor, once more found himself in imperial favor. He proceeded to Shimonoseki, the port designated by Japan as suitable for the discussion of the terms of peace. His credentials were satisfactory, and the interrupted negotiations were reopened. An armistice had been suggested, but was not favorably regarded by the Mikado's representatives.

At this juncture, an incident occurred which changed the whole tenor and temper of the negotiations. Li Hung Chang was shot at Shimonoseki and severely wounded by Kayama Rokunosuki, a young Japanese fanatic, and the whole empire instantly melted in sympathy. By the Mikado's personal order, the desired armistice was granted without further parley, all Japan's objections being magnanimously waived. For a time at least, the shed blood of the veteran warrior-diplomat secured peace for his country, now overrun by her enemies. It was a boon gladly accepted by the young Emperor who now entertained a greater admiration than ever for the grand old soldier. Li had repeatedly saved the throne in former crises and the fate of China was once more entrusted to his sagacity and patriotic fidelity. In the peace negotiations thus far, that have ever been received in the United State. These photographs were forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, by Presiding Elder J. W. Wadman of the M. E. Church at Hirosaki, Japan, and were accompanied by a brief sketch of the Emperor, written by T. A. Okada, a native scholar, in which Japan's enlightened ruler was thus described:

He is the 121st Mikado in the line of dynasty and came to his throne in the 25th year of our Japanese era (1866 A. D.) and in the sixteenth year of his age. He at once began to rescue his country from the bondage of feudalism, and endow her with a constitutional monarchy. In this he has succeeded, and we think that the pages of history show no greater event taking place under one ruler in so short a time. The Emperor, at the very beginning of his reign, encountered a great revolution which had arisen in his father's time, and which burst out anew at his accession. He finally succeeded in putting down the Shogun rule (Emperor's lieutenants), and thus abolished a power which had usurped the authority of the throne for 265 years.

Feudalism ended, the caste system gave place to the equality of man, and the great monarchy of modern Japan rose up. Our long-closed islands were opened and the stream of the civilization of the 19th century began to flow in. After fourteen years of his reign, during which he contended with such difficulties as the Formosa rebellion, the Lu-cu question, Korean complications and the Satsuma revolution, our Emperor promised his people constitutional government. Nine years were passed in making the necessary preparations, whereupon, amid the ecstacies of the subjects dwelling beneath his rule in great peace and prosperity, he promulgated such a constitution as had never been known in Asia. The 28th article of that constitution provides for freedom of faith in Nippon.

Our Emperor is tall of stature, noble in bearing, and fond of military things. It is said that his library is full of books on military subjects. He himself the claims of Japan, as outlined by Count Ito and Viscount Mutsu, the Peace Plenipotentiaries, will extend further than the payment of a war indemnity, which will probably be not less than 400,000,000 yen in gold (about $368,000,000), for it is expected that the cession of Port Arthur and Formosa will be demanded. Severe as such a sacrifice may be, it is hardly probable that China, with the invading armies almost at the gates of her capital, will hesitate to make it in the interest of peace. Japan, too, has suffered by the war, for her enormous expenditures have increased the national debt to $175,000,000, and peace would therefore be welcomed by the Mikado and his ministers.

Secrecy surrounds the deliberations of the Peace Conference at Shimonoseki. Li Hung Chang's wound is not now dangerous; he is sufficiently recovered to continue the negotiations. The old Imsetsuji Temple was fitted up as a temporary residence for the great Chinese Viceroy during his stay in Japanese territory, and from its balconies he can view the smart troops of the Mikado as they march past and mentally compare them with the antiquated armies of China. Although now over seventy, Li is still easily the foremost thinker of his nation and it may well be that his journey to Japan will result in bringing about a revolution in military methods, if nothing else, on his return.

The portraits of the Emperor and Empress of Japan published on the first page of this issue, are probably the only authentic pictures of these two distinguished royalties stands at the head of the army and navy. He is also devoted to literature, and is the patron of many literary circles.

The Empress is three years older than the Emperor. She is very benevolent in disposition, and has a motherly love for her people. To the work of such societies as that of the Red Cross she is very much devoted, while at the same time she spares no means to encourage the education of the people, especially that of her own sex. She is a poetess.

Shimonoseki, a town of over 10,000 inhabitants, is on the northern shore of the little strait between Kiushu and Hondo, in southwestern Japan. Ordinarily it is a place of minor importance, but its geographical position facing the Straits of Korea, rendered it available for conducting the peace negotiations between the contending powers. It is by no means a picturesque place, consisting as it does of one long, straggling street, which runs along shore for a mile and a half. Bayard Taylor, in describing the town when he visited it, wrote that the dwellings were mostly of wood, the warehouses, however, being covered with a sort of white cement or stucco, which is fire-proof. There is a considerable export trade. Among the curiosities of the place are two swords, said to have belonged to the Hideyoshi (historic warriors), and an ancient temple in which there is a picture representing a famous naval battle fought in 1184. After passing Shimonoseki (which means "Lower Barrier"), vessels enter the Inland Sea, on the shores of which are many towns and cities of importance, including Hiroshima, Osaka, and Hiogo. Shimonoseki was in 1868 a scene of naval operations when the combined English, Dutch, French and American fleets bombarded the old forts which have since been replaced by new defences. Being the natural pass to the Inland Sea, it will doubtless be made a naval port of considerable strength and importance by Japan in the near future.

Social life in Japan has received a new impulse since the present war began, and the whole nation has been fired with a spirit of patriotism which has found expression in fetes, festivals, and other demonstrations on every possible oocasion. Especially has this been the case whenever the intelligence of a new victory for the Mikado's troops has been received. Flower festivals and illuminations have been of frequent occurrence in Tokio and other large cities, during the war, and to the usual gayety of these occasions there has been added a patriotic sentiment and an enthusiasm such as is rarely witnessed in the East. Wealthy Japanese have given with great liberality to every project devised for securing comfort for the troops in the field, and fashionable ladies have been indefatigable in preparing boxes of lint and bandages for the wounded and cordials and dainties for the sick soldiers, the Empress herself setting a worthy example by undertaking the duty of directing several patriotic societies engaged in this work.

To Christians the world over, one of the brightest and most cheering developments of the Chino-Japanese war, has been the unexpected assent of the Japanese government to Christian missionaries having free access to the land and sea troops, in camp and on shipboard, as well as to garrisons and hospitals. This great concession by a government formerly regarded as distinctly "heathen," is the best evidence that could be desired of the remarkable progress Japan has made under her present enlightened ruler. Many thousands of copies of the Gospels in Japanese are even now being distributed at Hiroshima, Nagoya, and Osaka, by the missionaries, with the active cooperation of the military and naval officers. Permission has also been granted to assign four Christian chaplains to the army. This unlooked-for revolution in the religious exclusiveness of Japan has been the result of the long and patient teaching of Christian doctrines by the missionaries and native evangelical teachers. The chiefs and officers of both the army and navy departments have observed with satisfaction the improved discipline, efficiency and moral character of those soldiers and sailors who have accepted Christianity, and hence, on these grounds alone, have approved the new departure, which promises to be permanent. That it may be made a step toward the whole island empire being ultimately won for the Gospel should be the prayer of every follower of the Master. Henceforward, missionary effort in Japan will be conducted with greater zeal and energy than ever. Korea, also, will be an open harvest-field for the spiritual laborers and the great Chinese Empire, broken and dismembered through its successive defeats, may under the Divine blessing, be enabled to reap a glorious advantage from its adversities in the establishing of religious freedom and toleration, leaving the way open to still greater Gospel triumphs.

WON BY A WELCOME.

One Sunday night, years ago (wrote Rev. Wayland Hoyt) a young man and his wife strayed out into a church service. They were a lonely couple in a great city. They were neither of them Christian—rather, both of them, carelessly, even blatantly, unchristian. With the services they were not especially impressed. But after the service, as they were standing about looking at the church, the pastor approached them, and flinging his arm over the shoulder of the young man, welcomed him and his wife in a way so genuinely cordial that the hard edge of their strangeness was at once smoothed away, and the young couple were sure somebody had real interest in them. "We'll go to that church again," they said together after the warm welcome. They did. It was not long before both husband and wife accepted Christ as their Saviour and their Lord, and united with that church. It was a great trophy that pastor began to win that night, not by his sermon, but by his welcome. Almost penniless, and obscure, and quite disheartened, that young man was on that night when so warmly welcomed. To-day he is a member of a firm which flings the meshes of its business all over: and he is now one of the best and most winning of Sunday School workers and superintendents.

THE LORD'S SUPPER.

S. S. Lesson for April 28. Mark 14: 12-26. Golden Text Luke 22: 19. By Mrs. Baxter.

ACCORDING to the accounts given by the evangelists Matthew and Mark, it was the disciples who reminded Jesus of the passover feast, and the need to make ready for it. He had not forgotten it, but something more than the habitual observance of the feast was filling his mind. He said, "Ye know that after two days the passover cometh, and the Son of man is delivered up to be crucified." (Matt. 26: 2, R.V.) They did know that the passover was at hand, but the approaching they had neither ears to hear, nor hearts to understand. But what must it have been to him! A Bible student from a boy, he had at his finger-ends all the Scriptures, and knew the significance of all the sacrifices. To him the passover was not simply commemorative, it had been also anticipative in the past. And now the coming passover was to decide the destiny of mankind. He knew its import; but none of them could understand. To them the passover was something like Christmas is in pious families now: a religious feast and a time of family gathering as well. But not one of them could understand the tremendous burden which lay upon him as he, sharing all the weakness of our humanity, saw himself to be the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world. Who can know how he depended on his Father for this supreme moment!

Fulfilment of the Passover

It was a simple question which the disciples asked: "Where wilt thou that we go and make ready that thou mayest eat the passover?" Year after year, the question had been asked, but never had it meant, since the time of its institution, what it meant to him, for them, and for a sinful world, what it meant just then. But, in the life of the Master, details were not neglected in the greatness of his vocation as a whole. All had been forethought and prearranged by his Father, and he knew it. There was about all his movements; no rush, no hurry. "He sendeth two of his disciples, and saith unto them: Go into the city, and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water: follow him; and wheresoever he shall enter in, say to the good man of the house, Where is my guest-chamber where I shall eat the passover with my disciples? And he will himself shew you a large upper room furnished and ready; there make ready for us." (Mark 14: 13-15, R.V.) All was provided, nothing left till the last moment; and yet, neither he nor his disciples had done anything. They went forth, came into the city, found as he had said, and made ready the passover.

The evening came, and with it the assembled select company: Jesus and the twelve. But, select as that company was, there was a traitor in their midst. "As they sat and were eating, Jesus said, Verily I say unto you one of you shall betray me, even he that eateth with me." (Mark 14: 18, R. V.) Oh how he saw fulfilled in his own experience the words of David. (Ps. 51: 9.) The question went round the little company: "Is it I?" And he answered: "It is one of the twelve which dippeth with me in the dish," and added: "The Son of man goeth even as it is written of him." All must be fulfilled to the letter, the Word of the Father must be justified, but there is personal responsibility on the part of those who yield themselves as Satan's instruments: "Woe unto that man through whom the Son of man is betrayed. Good were it for that man if he had not been born." (ver. 21.) Up to the last hour with his disciples, he must have a contrary spirit in the midst in the person of Judas, of whom he had already said: "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?" (John 6: 70.)

And as they were eating he took bread (or a loaf, verse 22, margin), and when he had blessed, he brake it, and gave to them and said, "Take ye, this is my body." They had just partaken of the paschal lamb. The blood had been sprinkled on the lintel and the two doorposts, in memory of the great deliverance of their fathers from bondage in Egypt. Little did they understand the oft repeated lesson of Jesus that he must be crucified, and that his blood should save them from a more terrible bondage to sin. John the Baptist's testimony: "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world," had not opened their eyes to see that Jesus must indeed suffer. When Mary anointed their Master for his burial, far from understanding her, who understood her Lord, they condemned her of thoughtless extravagance and of a heartless disregard of the wants of the poor. And it was that Jesus broke the loaf, and said: "Take ye, this is my body!" Paul tells us (1.Cor. 10: 17 R.V.) "the bread [or loaf, margin] which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ? seeing that we who are many, are one bread [or loaf], one body; for we all partake of the one bread [loaf]." Just at the moment when Judas received the sop and went out, the discovered traitor (John 13: 30), and the remaining disciples should so soon forsake him and flee, Jesus gives them this token of being one with him and with each other! The elements of division were strong in them, but the power of unity was in the life which he gave to them, even life eternal, of which that bread was a sign and token. He was going away when his mission was accomplished, but he would leave behind him in the feast which he instituted, a constant token that as he is, so are we in this world, because he lives, we shall live also (John 14: 13). "He which sanctifieth and they which are sanctified are all of one, for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren" (Heb.2:11). Just as every piece broken off from the loaf belongs to it, and therefore dismembers it, so we make part of Christ (1. Cor. 12: 12) "As the body is one and hath many members, and all the members of the body, being many, are one body, so also is Christ." He would say by the Lord's Supper great as is the power of self in you to cause disunion, yet greater by far is the power of my life to bring about, and to cement, union. But how many, even of God's children, come to the Lord's table, not in the spirit of oneness with Christ, and with all God's children, but in a spirit of judgment of others, a spirit of gratulation, of spiritual pride, etc. None of these of the body of Christ. They may eat the bread and drink the wine, but beyond thus dealing with the mere elements, nothing happens. They have not met Christ at his table. It has been to them their denominational table, their church ordinance, not the Lord's table. At the Lord's table, all his true children are welcome guests, whatever their denomination, their nationality, their language. Christ's body, really and spiritually given to us, must convey his nature, his character.

To Such Disciples

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

VERY solemn and tender is the scene which is the subject of the lesson. The Master and his twelve disciples were assembled in the upper room at Jerusalem, as the shadows of the early evening were falling. Tradition says that the room was in the house of the Evangelist Mark, and that it was in this same room, afterwards, that the disciples were sitting when the Holy Spirit descended upon them. Jesus had walked over from Bethany with the twelve, to eat the Passover with them. There has been some doubt as to whether this was the Passover. The doubt is suggested by some expressions in John's Gospel (18: 28 and others), which seemed to imply that on the following day the Jews had not eaten the Passover. But Biblical scholars are now generally agreed that in those passages John is speaking of the ceremonies of the following Sabbath, which were held in high veneration; and that this last supper was the true Passover at which the lamb was eaten. So far as we can learn, Jesus had never before eaten the Passover with his disciples; but this year, with a human love, he desired, as he told them, to eat it with them before he suffered. The order of the feast in Christ's time departed but little from the ancient form, as minutely described in Exodus 12. It was not, however, eaten standing, with staff in hand, but reclining on divans arranged on a level with the table, the feet at right angles to the table and the body resting on the elbow. The meal consisted of the lamb, the bitter herbs, dry cakes of unleavened bread, and a dish of sauce, composed of dates, raisins, figs and vinegar, supposed to be typical of the mortar the fathers of the nation used in Egypt when they built for Pharaoh. Into this dish of sauce, each person at the table dipped the bread, the herbs and the meat, as they ate. At four appointed times during the feast, a cup of wine was drunk, the master of the feast reciting a certain formula at each. Toward the conclusion of the repast, when the cup was filled for the third time, a child was to ask the meaning of these ceremonies, and in reply the head of the household was to recite the deliverance from Egypt, which the feast commemorated, It was apparently at this part of the ceremony that Jesus startled the company by declaring that there was a traitor at the table. All were shocked and there was questioning of John and the others a then, Judas, fearing a more explicit exp ure, slunk out. Afterward, the ceremo proceeded, but when Jesus as the Head the feast took the bread and the cup, he not use the usual formula. Instead of s ing: "This is the unleavened bread wh your fathers did eat," etc., "This is the of the covenant which the God of Ab ham, Isaac and Jacob made," etc., he g a new significance to each. He said: "T bread is my body;" "This cup is the n covenant in my blood." Then with thetic simplicity, he told them what wanted them to do. Knowing that wit twenty-four hours, his earthly life wo be closed, he would leave them a memo observance, sanctified with his last tou in request, "This do in remembrance me." With all their faults and failin they all loved him and that love was constitute a bond of brotherhood. He cr ed a personal remembrance and instead asking for some great monument to built to his memory, he asked for this s ple tribute. All kinds of restrictions h grown around it since that night in the per room, but it was in this simple f that Christ asked for it and for this sin purpose. The Church calls it the "Euch ist," that is, a giving of thanks, referr to the hymns and psalms sung at the c mony; it calls it the "Communion," t is a common meal referring to the equa and fraternity of all who partake of it; the Romish Church calls it "the Mas and has forced upon it the stupid literal of transubstantiation; but in its origin, Christ instituted it, there is but the conception of those who love him com together as brethren, and calling his last quest to remembrance as they eat and dri

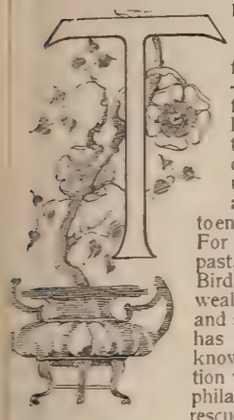
"THE LOST BOYS OF THE BOWERY."

s. Bird's Touching Story of her Efforts in their Behalf—A Soul-Winner's Life-work —The Need of the Bowery Mission among the Prodigals.



THIS is the story of one woman's work for the Master—a work so full of single-hearted devotion and consecration, that it may well serve as an example to encourage others. For many years past, Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, a lady of wealth, refinement and social position, has been widely known in connection with Christian philanthropy and rescue work, and that time she has been Divinely blessed the instrument in redeeming many lives. er labors are among lost men—those odigals who have been sick of eating the isks of sin, but who are unable of themlves to shake off their slavery. Her story told far better in her own words than by ny language another might employ. he tells it with much reluctance, for like a he servant of Christ, she would rather odestly hide her own personality and ve the glory to Him who has made such le of her talents and opportunities; but we el justified in giving it publicity in THE HRISTIAN HERALD, for the sake of the any thousands of others who are striving be of service, however humbly, in the iritual vineyard.

For over thirty years Mrs. Bird had held woman's meeting at the Plymouth Bethel, rooklyn. She had spent much time in nement house visitation, and thought she ad seen sin and misery in all its worst rms. Six years ago she went into rescue ork for lost women in New York, held a eeting in the most vicious localities, and ich revelations came to her that she deded to go on in this new field. She found would be impossible to gain access to the west dens of infamy in ordinary clothing, s they quickly detect the outsider. She ad already made the friendship of a woan in Roosevelt street, and in her little at- room she used to put on what she called er "slum dress," and in these faded garents she could go anywhere and everyhere unnoticed, even into the dance-houses, ves, and the cheap lodging-houses.

She soon became familiar with lodging-ouse life and was greatly interested in me of the poor lost men who frequented ese places. After her husband's death she cided to hold a service for these dging-house men, for she knew they ould never go into a church. She left a ard of invitation in some of the lodging-ouses to the men to meet her the next Sunay, and added: "a cup of coffee and a few ind words await you." She thought there ight be fifty who would respond, but to er surprise crowds came, so that the room ould not hold them.

Her Room was Packed to its utmost limit every Sunday. By utting soap-boxes in the aisles and on the latform she could seat about three hundred nd they would sit singing and hearing the Gospel invitation. As her room was too mall she was fortunate enough to get the se of a room in the Bowery Mission, but ven that is not large enough, for many still o away for want of seats. There are men who for three years and four months have ever missed a service; but about one-third f her audience are always strangers. Whoever happens to be at the lodging house and ear the singing as he passes, seems attracted. There is not a more quiet or attentive audience to be found in the city, nor more intelligent and appreciative.

There is not such a missionary field in he world as the Bowery. It is the magnet hat draws men from all nations and from ll conditions of life. The Bowery lodging-ouse is not only the hiding-place for the icious but the refuge for the unfortunate. Men from the highest positions in life, both by birth and education, are to be found there. One young man was noticed greatly absorbed with pencil and paper in the "Young Men's Home" of the Bowery Mission. A friend of the work standing near, ventured to look over his shoulder and found that he was amusing himself with problems in the highest course of mathematics—integral calculus. No one need come to speak to these men, expecting ignorant listeners, for among them are many well informed men.

"For three years and four months," Mrs. Bird explains, "I have held a Gospel service every Sunday (summer and winter), for lodging-house men. The and testimony lasts for four hours. The room has never been big enough; hundreds are turned away. Should you pass our Bowery Mission any Sunday morning between ten and three o'clock, you would see men standing outside eagerly watching for a chance to get in. This is the only morning service exclusively for men held in our city.

"Who are the audience? Every Sunday morning there are fifteen thousand men who come out of the lodging-houses in that locality, with no home, no friends, and no place to go. These are young men who have wandered from God and home. They have come from every city on the face of the earth; if a man becomes engulfed in sin in any part of the world, his ambition is to get to the Bowery. This is the magnet that attracts the restless and vicious wanderer. These men are often brought where they are surrounded by conditions beyond control. Parents and friends die, or there are stern fathers ann unwise, thoughtless mothers; the boy leaves home and is soon stranded in a cheap Bowery lodging-house. I give the Gospel invitation to over 40,000 of these lost men every year, many of them men of fine education and birth, and compel them to come in through love and kind words. In this audience of lost men, the cry is going up continually to God for mercy, and when a man gets near enough to God to fall on his knees and plead for help, and God's spirit enters his life day by day, there is no transformation like unto it. I have never known such agony as I have seen when kneeling in prayer by the side of the poor prodigal, but he was the child of a King, and his Father accepted his penitence and saved him. How do I know he is saved? 'By their fruits ye shall know them.'

Covered with Rags and Vermin,

"Fifteen thousand lost now in the Bowery! What is the Christian world going to do about it? As I look back and think of the unbelief I have had to fight, not only in my own heart, but in trying to get the sympathy and prayers of many Christians, it makes me tremble lest my courage might have failed. We find Christians in one breath proclaiming their belief in the Bible, and the next moment, saying, 'Do you think there is any hope for such men?' They tell me I am throwing my life away in trying to save the drunkard and the gambler. My Bible tells me that Christ Jesus came into the world to save just such men. He came

To Seek and Save the Lost.

There is a mighty power in the spiritual world, which, if received, can transform the vilest nature into Godlikeness! But these hundreds of lost men must see the Christ in the Bowery. The living Christ, as seen in his children, must go to them.

"For some reason these lost men will not go to our churches; they feel that the church has no interest in them. How little they realize what our churches are doing! Every humanitarian work has its origin and support in the Church of Christ? But this is the work of Christians at this hour, to go to the lost and by the kind words and warm grasp of the hand show that the Church is their Christ and their best friend.

"The harvest is ready on the Bowery. Money, and flesh and blood are the instruments that must be consecrated to this work. Come and hear the testimonies of our saved men. These men who speak telling what God has done for them, still live among their old companions in sin, that they may show how Christ can save from all sin. The testimony of a saved man before these hundreds of lost men is convincing, and they sit for hours listening to the wonderful story of salvation, and you will read in their faces that unmistakable anguish of expression, seeming to say: "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?' I have no hope for the Bowery but in the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. Who is to be raised up to save the lost boys in the Bowery? Bestow your thousands to the colleges; but while some prefer to endow a college, my constant prayer is that some one of God's noblemen may come to the rescue of the lost souls in the Bowery. There is much to encourage even in this work, for there are boys in those lodging-houses whose mothers are praying night and day for them; we find some of the noblest specimens of manhood bound hand and foot by Satan; boys there are there who say that they have heard for years they heard in the Bowery Mission. In my work I have been always treated most courteously by these lost men—some so appreciative of my interest in them as to give me their deepest confidence, and I have learned to know that they are fighting battles of which we can never know. And when we reach the better land you may find many of our brave boys there, and you may hear from above, 'These are they who came out of great tribulation.'

"As I hear the sad history of the poor lost men, it seems to me their wayward lives are but the natural result of their early home life; harsh, stern views of religious truths and lack of loving sympathy from their parents. I had in my bag a letter I had written at the request of one of my saved boys—to beg his father to let him come home as a prodigal, to ask pardon and forgiveness of his father. It seems so strange that these boys are afraid to go home. No one but a pastor of Dr. Talmage's wide experience can know how many lost boys there are in the Bowery lodging-houses. It is a revelation that must come to the Christian Church before any adequate efforts can be made to reach these prodigals. There are now hundreds who have been brought up in Christian homes, stranded in a cheap Bowery lodging-house, many of them under assumed names. How are the Christian people to be aroused to the mighty work in the Bowery? Think of coming out of those lodging-houses, and over the entrance of some of these cheap lodging-houses might well be written, 'The Gate of Death.'

"Who knows or cares about the death of the soul that is going on during the midnight hours? One night spent in a cheap lodging-house is often the end of all that is good and pure in a young man's life. It is full time there was a 'Young Men's Home' on Christian principles on the Bowery! It is easier to get money to send missionaries across the ocean than to get money to save one of our own boys. I prayed very earnestly as I listened to Dr. Talmage last Sunday, that his voice might be raised to plead for the lost boys in the Bowery. I have in my audience men from all parts of the world; when a man finds himself engulfed in sin his mind at once seems to turn to the Bowery. Every Sunday men get up to to thank God that the doors of the Bowery Mission were opened to them. They have

No Home, No Friends

—and hell itself opens its doors—and they often say, 'If I had not come to this room here in the Bowery Mission I should have gone to perdition!'

"I take to my home every Sunday and Thursday night, the agonizing cry of these men as they are struggling with sin. The harvest is ready and souls are going down to perdition every hour for the want of the Christ in the Bowery. These men, for some reason, think the Church has no sympathy for them. Let us pray for a day of Pentecost in the Bowery. The many tongues are there gathered from all the nations of the earth."

The noble work, which is conducted by Mrs. Bird at the Bowery Mission, is one that commends itself warmly to every Christian who has the soul-winning spirit. Its results are seen in the transformation of many lives. This devoted lady continues her labors every Thursday and Sunday, and all who are interested will be cordially welcomed on calling at the Bowery Mission Hall during the services.

TO THE FIELDS.

WE notice the revival of field sports. The gates of Spring have several times been set ajar, but not until this week have they been swung wide open. Lawn tennis, croquet, lacrosse, ball-playing and golf have fully opened. Let us rejoice at the prospect that so many of our people are to get into sunshine and open air. Our imprisonment in Winter bonds is ended, and the color is to come back to our cheeks and the spring to our steps. Let us make it a part of our religion to take care of our health. We are such unprofitable servants even in our strongest mood, that we need, as a matter of Christian duty, to keep nerve and muscle and brain in healthiest condition. Health is a talent: let us be careful how we expend it. In all matters of duty, and exercise, and dress, let us obey Paul's injunction to the jailer when he cried out, "Do thyself no harm." Have your homes well ventilated. Have the bedding well aired. See that the water is fresh. Let the pantries be pure as the fields. Watch carefully against the adulteration of food. Have all the lights out at ten o'clock at night. You have given to God your souls; give to him your "bodies, a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." Join a ball-club, if they do not gamble about the game; or a military company, if they do not drink; or an excursion to the fields; or a fishing party down the bay; or in some way get yourself under the benediction of the Springtime as God pours it out on mountain, and valley, and lake, and sea. The body all right, the mind all right, and the soul all right, let us rally all our physical, mental and spiritual energies to glorify God, and help the world. Now is our opportunity for usefulness. Now is our time to encourage the disheartened. Now is our time to work; for the shadows will soon begin to lengthen, and the sun will go down, and it will be the night, in which no man can work. Go forth and call wanderers home. Go forth and seek those who are so wounded of sin they cannot get back. Hear you not the voice of the Great Shepherd, who says:

[illegible]
For those who have missed their way?
[illegible]
The foul and darksome street?
[illegible]

HEAVENLY INVESTMENT.

WHAT an uncertain life this is! How many of those who were thought invulnerable have gone down! [illegible] Here [illegible] God to keep and [illegible] is to us beyond comprehension. But if our chief and most valuable deposits are in the National Bank of Heaven, we have all security, and there will be dividends of joy and blessedness declared through all eternity. The riches of this world may take wings and fly the other way; but the riches of heaven take wings and fly this way, and are forever accumulative. Get those treasures. Pile them up. With a consecrated avarice be more and more grasping after them; and long after the bullion of all the United States mints has melted, and the last pile of Government securities has gone into the ashes of the world's conflagration, you will be inheriting illimitable estate in the house at whose door loss and trouble knock in vain for admission.

MONUMENTS.

THE chiseling and unveiling of statues to commemorate great events, and the rearing of monuments of men and women who did well for the human race, is a matter of congratulation. It is not a waste of sculpture; not a waste of genius; not a waste of money. Great deeds of the past commemorated insure great deeds in time to come. They are lessons in courage, and patriotism, and self-sacrifice. But there is a surer way of being remembered, and there are monuments more enduring than marble or bronze. No sooner is an epitaph completed than Time, with its invisible hammer, begins its defacement. Already is that hammer busy with noiseless stroke on monuments this week erected. Not only do men die, but monuments die; cenotaphs die; epitaphs die; mausoleums die. But every good word a man utters, in places low or high; every kindly deed done, whether conspicuous or unheralded; every prayer, whether liturgical or broken, goes into the wall of God's spiritual temple, and will stay there, and look as fresh after a myriad of years have passed as when first set there. Angels will see it. All the ransomed will see it. All ages will see it. God will see it. The story of a cup of cold water as plainly inscribed as that of a rescued republic. The story of a nurse bending over the wounds of a battle-field as plainly as that of the commander-in-chief who led the army in triumph. The story of the Sabbath School teacher's faithfulness as plainly as the work of a Chrysostom. Christ will say, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, whether by day or night, up the dark alley, or in high places of the field, with medicine for the sick, or bread for the hungry, or comfort for the distressed, ye did it unto me." Go to work in such monument-building. All that you do for others in a Christian spirit becomes your permanent and ineffacable memorial. The last great day will be the uncovering of that monument. Instead of the few thousands of people gathered to hear an oration before some commemorative sculpture, there shall be a great multitude that no man can number present at the uncovering of the monument which shall tell the story of your work, however great or insignificant. With congratulation, and song, and ringing bells, and all of the harps of God, and all the doxologies of heaven, that occasion will be celebrated. Does the glory seem too great for an unpretentious soul like you? It doth not yet appear what you shall be.

FAILURES IN BUSINESS.

OUR sympathies should always be ready for financial sufferers. We have heard only one side of the story: that of men who have lost money, and of some men who are glad to see rivals go under. The other side of the story has not been told by the unfortunates, but there may be explanations that would give ninety per cent. of alleviation, if they were only known. The word "mistake" will often cover what the world calls swindle. There are two sides to every financial catastrophe, and God knows both. Blessed be his name forever! There have been in the history of this country thousands of men who have failed in business, yet are completely honest, and far more honest than some who have never suspended payment. It sometimes requires more moral courage to stop than to go on. So that we are to learn all the practical lessons, while at the same time we are to exercise largest leniency, and hope for honorable solution of things now inexplicable, and hold in mind that tremendous passage of Scripture, which critics of others are apt to forget: "Judge not, that ye be not judged; for with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

If any of our readers who know of active, zealous Christian workers in their neighborhood who, without fee or reward, are devoting time and means to the service of Christ in rescuing the lost, uplifting the fallen, or befriending the sick and poor, would send us biographical sketches of such persons—men or women—we should be glad. The story of their work, showing their methods and the success which has attended them, might encourage other Christian people to undertake similar work in their cities. The sketch should be accompanied in every instance by a photograph of the person. Address Editor of Christian Workers' Department, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

Any reader of this journal knowing of a homeless little orphan girl, can procure her adoption into an excellent Christian family by addressing Fleming Evans, Dows, Wright Co., Iowa.

J. Gordon Leverette, Valdosta, Ga. In what part of the Bible do we find an account of Lucifer being hurled from heaven, and of fire raining down from heaven upon Elijah's offering?

The passages referred to are Isaiah 14: 12; II. Peter 2: 4; Jude 6, and I. Kings 18: 38. Milton in "Paradise Lost" has a sublime description of the fall of Lucifer, based upon the Scriptural passages.

Arthur Meachen, Minneapolis, Minn., in a letter commending the plan of publishing the lives of humble Christian workers, says:

I think it is an excellent idea and I trust that this matter may be often brought before the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I firmly believe that that is one of the principal reasons why THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has such an enormous circulation—because of its unselfish efforts on behalf of others it is like the widow's cruse of oil we read of in the Old Testament, ever giving, yet always with a plentiful supply.

Nemo, New York. What is meant by a profane person in Hebrews 12: 16?

The word is used in a similar sense when we speak of profane history, meaning secular. In calling Esau "a profane person," the writer of the Epistle intimates that he was not a man of any spirituality, but one who esteemed the good things of life, the things which give physical pleasure more valuable than immaterial and spiritual things. He mentions in illustration his parting with the privileges belonging to him as the eldest son for a bowl of soup. The lesson is that the man who cares more for the gratification of his bodily appetites than he does for the development of his spiritual nature, is a profane or non-spiritual person, who is unfit for Christ's kingdom.

B. B. G., Croton, N. Y. Is the Church in partnership with the liquor traffic?

The common idea of partnership is of one who derives a profit from a business and generally helps in the management. Probably there are some churches in which liquor dealers contribute to the funds, but we do not think that it is done to a sufficient extent to constitute the church a partner in the traffic. It would be difficult to measure the degree of complicity of the church in the matter. Probably if all its members acting in unison, exerted all the political power they have, in a combined attack, the liquor traffic might be suppressed or greatly restricted and therefore there is responsibility. No business man, however, would like his partner to act toward their business as the Church acts toward the liquor traffic. It discourages the traffic, denounces it and its influence is altogether on the side of temperance and sobriety.

Subscriber, Davenport, Iowa. 1. Who were the Moravians of whom we hear in missionary work? 2. How were Jesus and his disciples supported during Christ's ministry?

1. Their proper name is "The United Brethren," or "Unitas Fratrum," unity of the brethren. Moravia and Bohemia were among the first countries to have the Bible in the vernacular, and when those countries fell under the power of the Romish Church, there were a large number of Bible readers who resisted, and in 1415 their leader, John Huss, suffered martyrdom rather than yield to the papacy. Thus, more than half a century before Luther, the Reform movement commenced. The followers of Huss were persecuted, but increased in number until 1627, when Ferdinand II. slaughtered some and drove others into exile until the church was thought to be extinct. A few remained, however, and held secret meetings, and trained their children in the faith. A century afterward there was a great revival and a centre of work was established at Herrnhut in Saxony. Settlements were made in other lands and a missionary work commenced among the heathen, which has won the admiration of all Christendom. Their belief does not differ [illegible] terially from that of other evangelical denominations. 2. Probably the chief source of [illegible] come was the gifts of friends. Luke mentions (8: 3) certain women who contributed. It was common in those times for a Rabbi going about the country teaching to be entertained free by the chief people of the villages. We imagine that a very small sum would suffice for their wants.

J. M. L. Porter, North Ogden, Mich., writes:

The Bible assures us it rained forty days and forty nights when the flood came, positively declaring every hill and mountain under heaven was covered. Fifteen cubits above the tops of the highest mountains, did the waters prevail. Take the loftiest peak, Mount Everest, which is 29,003 feet above sea level, the 15 cubits which adds 330 feet more, we have the height of the waters, 29,333 feet above sea level. The waters swelled upward over seven hundred feet every twenty-four hours. At the end of the first two four hours the ark was over seven hundred feet above sea level. This gives us some idea how suddenly all chances for life were cut off. At the end of forty days, Noah and the great Ark were rolling on the bosom of the maddened waters at an altitude of 29,333 feet above sea level. To demonstrate the truthfulness of this Scriptural problem, when the waters subsided, the vessel landed on Ararat—15,[illegible] feet above sea level.

B. A. Parker, Lansing, Mich. Will a heathen person who has never heard of Christ be saved if he has lived a conscientious life, as far as his light went?

A slender ground for hope is given in Christ's words (Luke 12: 48.) It is, however, a clear duty to carry the Gospel to the heathen, and not to trust to any such possibility. There must be many among them, as there are among civilized nations, who are not living up to the light they have.

Minnie L. Brooks, Marion, Ill. What gave rise to the custom of burying the dead with the head toward the West?

Some quaint notion of the resurrection was probably the basis of the practice. A body buried, if raised to an erect position would face the East, which has always been regarded as the most honorable part of the compass, the place of the sun's rising, the place where Christ's star appeared and the place where the early Christians expected him to appear on return.

Henry Wood, Allentown Pa. What river is referred to as The River of Egypt in Joshua 15. 4?

Some commentators believe it to have been the Nile. But the Hebrew power did not extend over the desert. The Nile, may, however have been regarded as its political boundary. Others think that it referred to the Wady Arish, which runs through the Sinaitic Peninsula; and that is now becoming the general opinion.

Reader, Des Moines, Ia. Is there any explanation of the selection of Moses and Elias as the heavenly visitants on the Mount of Transfiguration?

It may be that Moses was sent as a representative of the law and Elijah as the representative of the prophets. The Jews so regarded them. Probably no historical personage not excepting David, were so venerated as they and therefore their appearance with Christ on the Mount would be most impressive as an endorsement of his person and mission.

Subscriber, Toronto, Can. Why does Faster Sunday come on different days in different years? How known on what day of the month Christ rose from the dead?

The crucifixion and resurrection of Christ were so closely associated with the celebration of the Jewish Passover in the minds of the early Christians that the anniversary was naturally simultaneous with that feast, and it has remained so. The date of the Passover is regulated by the moon, as the Jews reckoned by lunar months. The Passover was held at the first full moon after the spring equinox. Easter Sunday is, therefore, the Sunday following the first full moon after March 21. There is good reason for believing that Christ rose from the dead on April 9, A. D. 30.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A BELEAGURED GARRISON.

DETAILS of a desperate fight on the West coast of Africa come by the recent mails. It appears that the Royal Niger Trading Company has a station at Akassa, where the River Niger runs into the Gulf of Guinea. The place is used by the company for the reception of products from the interior and they are stored there to await the arrival of steamers to carry them to European ports. Across the Bay in the Brass country the natives are hostile and recently, since imperative orders have been issued by the company that no liquor shall be sold to them, they have come in their canoes around Akassa at night to obtain it secretly. Early this year the employees of the company seized some canoes engaged in this traffic and the Brassmen threatened retaliation. They were not feared, however, as there was a machine-gun at Akassa. The forces of the company were needed up the country at Lokoja and Ibi and they were withdrawn from Akassa, leaving that station in charge of eight Europeans and about seventy native clerks. The Brassmen discovered this fact and one morning attacked the station in force. Not less than fifteen hundred men, the majority armed with Enfield rifles, swarmed around the station. The machine-gun was brought into operation, but proved useless, the breech being blown off after it had been fired a few times. Two of the Europeans were at once dispatched up the country for assistance. The others barricaded the lower floor and took refuge in an upper story, from the veranda of which they maintained a fire on the assailants, until the rain of shots drove them under cover. One of the Europeans, a Mr. Wise, who managed the printing department of the company's business, was captured by the Brassmen and carried off a prisoner to Nibi. It was subsequently learned that he was cruelly tortured and afterward beheaded. The Brassmen broke into the ground floor of the station after the little garrison retreated from the veranda but were unable to penetrate to the upper floor. They fired several shots through the ceiling at random, seriously wounding one of the Europeans. They then devoted their time to looting the stores. All the goods were carried away in canoes, this work continuing until nightfall. Early the next morning the arrival of a steamer and a force brought by the messengers, prevented a renewal of the attack. Two other steamers arrived some days later, and fully the Europeans retaliated by an attack on the Brassmen at Nimbi, killing the people and burning their village. The whole story is sickening in its cruelty on both sides. The white men did not torture their prisoners, as the blacks did, but they showed barbarity in executing vengeance which proved them to be savage in their nature. It is obvious that the blacks would not be made more gentle by such civilization as the whites possessed and that what both needed was the religion of Christ which alone can change the nature. (Gal. 5:22,23.)

The Use of the Chronoscope.

A machine to measure the rapidity of mental operations was recently exhibited at the University of the City of New York, and, if it answers the tests applied to it, will be brought into use in the School of Pedagogy. It consists of a pendulum so adjusted that it will swing over a given arc in exactly a second. A band of metal runs from one end of the arc to the other, bearing a scale divided into a thousand parts. Swinging from a centre, exactly coincident with that of the pendulum, is a pointer, which by a curved bar and light spring connects with a button, so that when the button is pressed, the pointer clips the scale and remains stationary. A third part of the apparatus is a small shutter connected with the pendulum, which opens and closes at a certain point of the pendulum's course. A silk curtain conceals every part of the apparatus except the button and the shutter. A pupil being set before the instrument, is told to keep his eyes on the shutter, and when he sees any given color appear there, to press the button. A revolving disk brings the color to the back of the shutter, and when the action of the pendulum opens the shutter and reveals the color, the button is pressed, the pointer clips the scale, and marks the exact instant when the pupil has acted on his perception. The distance of that spot from the one at which the pendulum is when it opens the shutter, shows the time occupied by the pupil's brain in turning his perception into action, and consequently the dullness or brightness of his mental operations in all matters. It thus measures the speed of thought. The inventor contends that his instrument will show that the difference between the speed of thought in different children is much greater than is supposed. He insists that if two children accidentally touch a hot iron, one will draw away his finger much more quickly than the other, and that it will be a distinct gain to the teacher to know what each pupil's rate of thought is. It is not surprising that it is necessary in such a case, in measuring the interval between perception and action, to have an instrument indicating the thousandth part of a second; but in spiritual matters no such nicety is required. Months and even years often intervene between the time when a person perceives his spiritual danger and the means of escaping it and the time when he puts his perception into practice. (Heb. 3: 13.)

REPELLING THE BRASSMEN AT AKASSA, WESTERN AFRICA.

A Clever Counterfeit.

A gang of skilful counterfeiters have discovered a sure means of defrauding the public. Press dispatches from Omaha, Neb., say that the National Bank of that city have received from customers several ten-dollar bills which they declare to be forgeries. The plan of the counterfeiters is based on the discovery of some chemical which will remove the printing from a greenback. Hitherto it was supposed that the character of the fibre in the greenback paper rendered the ink indelible. The counterfeiters operate on one-dollar bills, removing the word "one," or the figure, wherever it appears, and substituting "ten." To the teller of a bank, or to any careful, observant person, the fraudulent character of the bill is apparent at a glance, as the portrait of neither Stanton nor Martha Washington is ever printed on a ten-dollar bill. The counterfeits bear one of these portraits, as the swindlers appear to have thought it safer to retain the original portraits on the one-dollar bills they operate on, than to attempt to print the proper portraits of the ten-dollar bills. It will be well, therefore, for persons to whom ten-dollar bills are paid, to see not only that the denomination is correct, but that it bears the proper portrait. Perhaps the same principle might be advantageously used in the discrimination of character. However loud and unctuous a profession may be, it is not reliable if the man's life and conversation do not bear the image of Christ. (1 Cor. 15: 49.)

A Life Sentence.

The surprising news comes from Staunton, Va., that a citizen of that State has been sentenced to imprisonment for life for a comparatively trivial offence. He was detected by a grocer of the town in the act of stealing a piece of bacon valued at less than forty cents. He was arraigned on the charge and pleaded guilty. He was a poor, miserable creature, a carpenter by trade and an habitual drunkard. Evidence was brought to show that he had been repeatedly sentenced to short terms of imprisonment for petty thefts, and that whenever he was out of the almshouse or prison, his one aim was to get drunk, and if he could not get the necessary funds in any other way, he would steal. The judge availing himself of a law on the State statute books relating to habitual criminals, sentenced the prisoner to imprisonment for life. The prisoner's counsel contended that it was an outrage to give a life sentence for stealing forty cents worth of goods, but the judge showed he had the right by law to pronounce the sentence. An attempt is to be made to reverse the sentence on the ground that the provisions of the law come within the category of "cruel and unusual punishments," prohibited by the constitution. The makers of the law appear to have proceeded on a principle, often forgotten by men who argue that eternal punishment is inconsistent with God's character as a God of love, the principle that persistence in wrongdoing is an indication of character which mercy cannot reform. (Heb. 10: 27.)

Prayers in Pads.

In the course of a suit now pending in the Surrogate's Court in New York, a curious instance of superstition was described. The will in dispute was that of a recently deceased lady who had, according to the evidence of her relatives, given signs of being of unsound mind. The strongest proof of her insanity in the opinion of the relative doubtless was that she had left her money to various institutions instead of to them; but they mentioned other eccentricities of a peculiar character. Among these was the fact that she always wore a number of pads on her body, each being labeled and numbered, so that she could be sure in putting them on, to which part of her body each belonged. After her death the pads were opened and were found to contain strips of paper on each of which, written in German, was a prayer to God to relieve her of the aches and pains in the part of her body on which that particular pad was worn. This was using prayer much as the African uses his fetich and as superstitious people among us use charms. No rational, sensible person would expect to derive any benefit from a pad because of a prayer being in it. But the delusion differs only in degree from the delusion of that numerous class who think that church membership and an observance of the ordinances will relieve them of the suffering entailed by a sinful life, which only regeneration can avert. (John 3: 3.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. Talmage Preached Twice in New York last Sunday and on April 7. Last Sunday he preached in the afternoon at the Academy of Music and in the evening at the West Presbyterian Church, of which Dr. Paxton was pastor. On the previous Sunday, after the usual afternoon service at the Academy of Music, he preached to an enormous audience at the Carnegie Music Hall. Dr. Talmage asks the prayers of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for God's blessing on these services to the large number of persons attending them, who are not in the habit of going to any place of worship.

An English Saloon-keeper has Recently won a suit for libel against a Baptist minister who denounced his traffic. The damages were $375, and the minister is now carrying the case to a higher court.

The Young Woman's Training School, at East Northfield, Mass., held its commencement exercises last week. There are now seventy-one students enrolled; and of the graduates, one goes to Mr. Moody's Institute in Chicago, one to the foreign mission field, and two become pastors' helpers, while the rest return to their homes or go elsewhere for more complete education.

Evangelist Thomas Harrison Began a campaign at Millville, N. J., after the conclusion of his work at Bridgeton. The "Daily Pioneer" reports wonderful services. From Newport, Mauricetown, Leesburg, Port Elizabeth, Vineland and other towns the people flocked to hear the famous Evangelist and the services were continued from week to week beyond the expectation of the churches. Many conversions are reported.

Ex.-U. S. Consul John L. Waller, whom the French officers in Madagascar have condemned to twenty years imprisonment, is forty-five years old. He was born a slave, and lived at Madrid, Mo., until the war broke out. He subsequently lived at Topeka, Kans., until President Harrison appointed him U. S. Consul at Tamatave, Madagascar. The Queen and her ministers had a great respect for him, and his friendship with them has involved him in trouble with the French.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has been holding successful union services at Montgomery, Ala. On March 31, the Montgomery "Daily Advertiser" says there were over three thousand persons at the meeting and almost as large an audience was present on the following evening. About five hundred persons rose to ask for prayer and 110 made confession of Christ as the result of the services.

The Muskogee Mission School in the Indian Territory, under the care of the Presbyterian Church, has developed into a college, and receives the name of "Henry Kendall College," after the well known, highly honored man, who was for so long Secretary of the Home Mission Board.

The New York Bible and Fruit Mission in East Twenty-sixth street, has applied to the Supreme Court for permission to change its name to The Manhattan East Side Mission. It is doing a good work among the discharged prisoners, who are landed from Blackwell's Islands near the Mission's rooms.

The Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church reports total receipts of eleven months of $616,019, against $505,777 for the corresponding period of last year. This gain of $111,000, includes nearly $43,000 in the woman's executive committee and $88,500 in legacies. Receipts from the churches have fallen off $15,763.

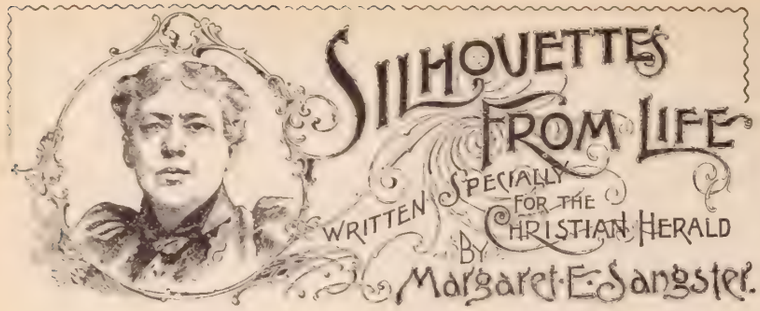
An Effort is being Made to Commence a work among Hungarians in New York. At a recent meeting of the New York Presbytery, the Rev. John B. Devins reported that there are forty thousand in the city, divided among Jews, Roman Catholics and Protestants. Five thousand are nominally Protestant, and desire to hear the Gospel in their native tongue. As there is no Protestant service in Magyar, some of them attend the Roman Catholic church where there is preaching in that language. A Protestant minister who can preach in Magyar is now to be engaged and services held in Hope Chapel.



IN THE CLOUDY DAY.

"GOOD-NIGHT, Rob, old fellow!" "Good-night, Jack! I'll see you to-morrow. Now I must make a bee line for Bess and the babies!"

The two young men separated at the corner in Newspaper Row, where the two tall buildings occupied by two great daily journals tower up many stories high. One of them is crowned by a glittering gilded dome. Both are magnificent structures, and between them is a narrow street, steep and generally crowded, and this has been called by a wit, "The Cave of the Winds," for the winds riot here, even in summer.

One man, Jack, crossed to Brooklyn by the bridge, Rob took the Roosevelt Street Ferry, and so went plunging at a great pace through the Cave of the Winds, his mind intent on Bess and the boys, two chubby, rosy darlings, and on the supper that awaited him. His salary had been raised to-day; Bessie would be so glad. She would laugh like the sweet girl she was, put th arms around his neck; he thrilled already at the thought of his wife's kiss. Jack Robbins was a very happy man.

A tug at his coat! A voice in his ear, a hoarse, pleading voice. A wild face, eager and unshaven, and these the words:

"Oh! for the love of God, come home with me. My baby's dead. We've neither food nor fire. For the love of God, man, come and see for yourself. The baby's dead, dead I say!"

Jack had his week's earnings in his breast pocket, his long ulster buttoned over them. It is natural for the respectable citizen to hesitate, when appealed to in the gathering dusk, by a ragged and tramp-like being, who lives in the slums. But Jack was a brave man, and furthermore, he had learned that there are perils elsewhere than in the slums. If the poor fellow had lost his baby, and was in such straits as he represented, it was somebody's duty to help him. If he got into a den, he would trust to his athletic muscles to help him out.

So, into Cherry street, and down an alley, in the darkest part, to a tall rear tenement, went Jack and his companion. Tenement doors are never locked. The two men went unhindered into a little black entry, and up four flights of narrow, slippery stairs. Then Jack's new friend,—for the impulse to help makes one dismiss the thought of strangers from one's mind,—Jack's new friend opened his own door.

The barest back room you ever saw, lighted dimly by one kerosene lamp. On a pine-table, with a sheet over it, the poor little form of a baby, clothed only with one scanty garment, its waxen hands crossed, its flaxen hair clinging to its transparent forehead, its long-lashed eyes shut. A baby that had died for want of proper nourishment, in the great, gay, rich city of New York, in the year of our Lord, 1895.

Rocking herself to and fro was the baby's mother, an image of woe. The stony grief in her tearless eyes stabbed Jack to the very heart.

"Madeline," said the woman's husband, "I have brought somebody who will help us."

Jack Robbins started at the tone. It had a familiar cadence. Where and when had he last seen this man, heard this voice. It was the voice of an educated man. The tramp, for such he looked, was a gentleman. But tramps do not give hostages to fortune, in the shape of homes, wives, and children. Elbridge Stanton was desperately poor, and unfortunate, and he was, though reduced to beggary, neither a drunkard nor a thief; he was, for all his terrible case, a perfectly respectable citizen still, just as Jack was.

Suddenly Jack remembered all about it.

"Elbridge, for the sake of all that is good and holy, tell me how you came here; how you have sunk into such dire penury and want? Great Scott, man, the class of '89 would have helped you if they had known your need."

When last these two had met, Elbridge had been stroke oar in the college crew, and Jack its captain. Elbridge's father had then been wealthy. By a succession of misfortunes the wealth had been lost. The father was dead. Elbridge had married, and for many months had been out of work. A man out of work, with nobody to back him, grows despairingly morbid. The whole world apparently combines to keep him out. A man who neither drinks nor gambles, nor wastes money on any self-indulgence, such as smoking, may spend months, and walk his shoes off his feet, looking in vain for work in a great busy town. To such a man suicide sometimes beckons alluringly, when God and his fellows seem to have forgotten him altogether.

Elbridge had not known Jack Robbins when he spoke to him. Not until everything, to the wife's wedding ring, was pawned, and the baby's last gasp had flickered out like a spent candle, had he gone forth, a poor hunted creature, to beg from any stranger. He had gone, but God had sent him, and God had guided him to Jack, his old class-mate and chum.

"How Providential it is," said Bessie that night, when she and Jack were lingering over the delayed supper, "How Providential that your salary has been raised. We can help Elbridge and Madeline, and get them on their feet, and the Lord must have meant just that, for really, dear husband, we had enough before. I think more money means more responsibility, more to answer for to God, how we spend it or what we save it for, but our way is perfectly plain and clear now. We will go right over to-night, and bring the poor things home."

"To-night, my darling?"

"Yes, Jack, why not? We can take a carriage. From what you say, they must need everything, and I think, they'll sleep better in one of our beds, than in that wretched place. And the poor little baby, we must have it laid away in our plot. God sent you down that dreadful street, Jack dear, and, you know the verse we read together this morning, and how we puzzled over its special message to us, to-day. Now, I see it, and we must obey the voice, "The King's business requireth haste!"

If this were fiction, you might think it overwrought. But it is true. Stranger true things occur every day of our lives, than anything ever woven by the fancy of the story-teller. Our brother at our side, faints and perishes with hunger, our next neighbor dies of hope deferred. Our Master sitting in the heavens, still says, "The poor ye have always with you," and "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these, my servants, ye did it unto me."

MRS. JAMAL'S WORK COMMENDED.

Since the notice of Mrs. Jamal's excellent Christian work among the untaught Syrian girls of Jerusalem appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a number of friends have written to this office sending contributions in aid of the training-class. Mrs. Jamal writes that the class now consists of fourteen girls who are doing very well. Five others have applied for admission to the class, but the funds at Mrs. Jamal's disposal prevent its present enlargement.

Among many prominent ladies who have visited the training class and are familiar with Mrs. Jamal's work, are the wife of Rt. Rev. Bishop Blyth, of Jerusalem; Mrs. E. S. Wallace, wife of the United States Consul at Jerusalem, and Miss Annie Way, of the Bishop's Mission house in that city. The first-named lady writes:

"The Bishop has always felt great sympathy in this effort, made by an Arab lady on behalf of her own countrywomen, and thinks it deserving of every help and encouragement."

Mrs. Wallace writes, "speaking from a personal knowledge of Mrs. Jamal's class, I can only say it is a good work and worthy of assistance."

A SHRINE IN A STABLE.

Bishop C. B. Galloway writing of his recent tour in India, gives this interesting description of a visit to the stables of the Maharajah of Jeypore: "A visit to the royal stables disclosed something of the grandeur in which an Oriental sovereign can live when he has a chance. There were three hundred horses, and each horse had a separate groom. Each horse was tied with three ropes—one around his neck to a ring, and around each hind foot to a small post ten or fifteen feet off. These posts were of white marble, and the trough in each stall was also trimmed with marble. In these stables was a little Hindu shrine for the accommodation of the three hundred horsemen, who may pay their daily vows to the gods and ask good luck upon the steeds committed to their care. The other quarters, where the one hundred royal elephants are kept, we failed to see."

The use of eggs on Easter Day (so times called Pasche or paste eggs), is a ancient custom. By the Egyptians were held as a sacred emblem of the vation of mankind after the Deluge. A sim sport is observed in some European co tries where Easter eggs are "rolled u the green" against each other till broke

NEW BOOKS.

THE NEW DICTIONARY.

The Characteristics and Special Features of the Newest Addition to America's Standard Works.

AMONG the chief literary events of the year, the completion of the Standard Dictionary, now issued by the Funk & Wagnalls Company, occupies an important place. About a year ago we published a notice of the first volume, with some account of its plan and the system adopted by the large corps of scholars at work upon it. The second volume, which completes the work, is fully equal to the first in its copious vocabulary and typographical beauty. Perhaps there are few people who realize how enormous are the labor and expense involved in the making of a really comprehensive dictionary. The publishers say that the Standard has cost over $960,000, and that 247 eminent specialists have been working upon it since it was commenced five years ago. The result is a work which justifies the name of "Standard" in its full significance.

The first characteristic that impresses the ordinary person who uses the dictionary is likely to be the enormous number of words in the English language. The Standard contains and classifies over three hundred thousand. When it is remembered that Worcester's dictionary contains only 105,000, it will be realized that not only has the language grown in the interval since the publication of Worcester's, but that the editors of the Standard must have been very industrious in collecting the new words and the cognate words generally omitted in other dictionaries. Of course, a large part of the added words are scientific terms and technical words which have been coined to characterize new inventions and new discoveries. Such words as "Linotype," the name of a newly-invented machine for setting type, and the host of words brought into existence by the development in the application of electricity, form an entirely new field of research. Besides these, there is scarcely a department of study that has not had the effort to attain greater precision added some new words to its vocabulary. Even geology, which is popularly supposed to be the most stationary of all sciences, has found it necessary to add the word "erranite," and some others to its list, not always with the satisfaction of its conservative professors. The editors have not been satisfied with a general definition of these terms, but have obtained from specialists, and have recorded, the full and exact meaning which the words are intended to convey. This renders the Standard so exceedingly valuable, because it is these unfamiliar words, appearing up unexpectedly in the newspaper or in a book, that send the reader to his dictionary to learn their meaning. Care has been taken to meet the wants of all classes, so that the dictionary may be a friend to the learned man who does not know the meaning of "craps," nor what a "pantata" is, and the unlearned man who has no idea what is meant by hecastotheism, nor what to find of an instrument is the "heliochromotrope." The dictionary-maker, as a rule, has heretofore been somewhat niggardly in imparting his information, giving sometimes synonyms instead of explanation, and tantalizing the person who consults him by an apparent definition which leaves him as ignorant as he was before. The editors of the Standard deserve the public thanks for pursuing a more generous system. They not only give the simplest explanation possible in popular terms, often with pictorial illustration, but they suggest, by what in an index would be called cross references, where and under what headings the seeker may obtain further information on the same subject. In this way the dictionary has become a species of encyclopædia, in which fulness and brevity are combined with extraordinary intelligence and a perception of the purposes for which people commonly consult a dictionary. This encyclopædic information has made the dictionary something which no one ever supposed a dictionary could be—a volume that might be read with interest.

The critical feature of a dictionary, however, must be the spelling of the words. The editors in this matter had to sail between Scylla and Charybdis. The conservatives, on the one hand, who like to write "honour," "labour," "favour," &c., and the progressives, on the other, who want to rob us of the final "me" in "programme," and "ue" in "catalogue," would be sure the one or the other of them to denounce the dictionary-maker as an iconoclast or a fossil. He might take his choice, but he could not please both parties. The Standard takes generally a moderate course, and while remedying some of the most glaring anomalies, does not attempt to introduce phonetic novelties which are offensive to the eye. We are sorry to see the words "sulfur," "esthetics," "fetus," "bromin," "quinin," and a few others preferred in their unfamiliar style, and there really seemed no need for the change, but on the whole there are fewer innovations than might have been expected. The unstinted praise the Standard has received from the English Universities and the leading newspapers on that side the Atlantic is a proof that the editors have not taken unwarrantable liberties with the language which is the common property of the two nations.

The value of the dictionary is enhanced by a copious appendix, which is a most useful part of the book, and will be often consulted. In this is a list of proper names which occur in Bibliology, history, mythology, geography, and fiction, with the pen-names adopted by authors of repute. Also a glossary of foreign words and phrases, a list of arbitrary signs used in scientific treatises, in commerce, and typography, and what will specially interest young people at a period of their lives when their interest is assuming a concentrated form—a list of the poetical and symbolical significances of flowers and gems.

THE TRIBULATION.

Antichrist's Rule to be a Period of Bitter Persecution of Christians.

BY A MASTER OF ARTS.*

IN the book of Daniel, in the discourses of Christ and in the apocalypse of John there are predictions of a time of persecution to come in the last days. As we are now on the threshold of that period, we shall be wise to examine these prophecies that we may understand the things which must shortly come to pass. The predictions will be found in Daniel 7: 24, 25; 12: 1, 10, 11; Matt. 24: 21-43; Rev. 11: 7-10; 12: 6; 13: 5-8.

Let us apprehend and realize the idea, thus clearly brought before us, that, sheltered as the Church has been from persecution for many years, yet a persecution awaits the Church before the end, fiercer and more perilous than any which occurred at its first rise.

Further, this persecution is to be attended with the cessation of all Christian worship. The early Fathers maintain (as St. Augustine stated) that Antichrist will suppress for three years and a half all worship of the true God.

And further, we are told: "They shall place the abomination that maketh desolate,"—they shall "set it up." Our Saviour declares the same. In the typical fulfilment of this prophecy, it has been the introduction of heathen idols into God's house.

Moreover the reign of Antichrist will be supported, it would appear, with a display of miracles, such as the magicians of Egypt effected against Moses. On this subject we wait for a fuller explanation of the prophetical language, such as the event alone can give us. So far, however, is clear, that whether real miracles or not, whether pretended, or the result, as some have conjectured, of discoveries in physical science, they will produce the same effect as if they were real, viz., the overpowering the imaginations of such as have not the love of God deeply lodged in their hearts,—of all but the elect. Scripture is remarkably precise and consistent in this prediction, "Signs and wonders," says our Lord, "insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." (Matt. 24: 22). And St. John: "He doeth great wonders, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men." (Rev. 13: 13, 14.)

In these four respects, then, not to look for others, will the last persecution be more awful than any of the earlier ones: first, in its being in itself fiercer and more horrible; second, in its being attended by a cessation of the ordinances of grace; third, by an open and blasphemous establishment of infidelity, or some such enormity, in the holiest recesses of the Church; and four in being supported by a power of working miracles. Well is it for Christians that the days shall be shortened!—shortened for the elect's sake, lest they should be overwhelmed,—shortened, as it would seem, to three years and a half.

It is quite certain, that if a persecution has been foretold, it has not yet come, and therefore is to come, as has been the common belief, I may say, of all ages. So that every generation of Christians should be on the watch-tower, looking out,—nay, the more and more as time goes on.

Next, I observe that signs do occur from time to time to show us it is coming. The world grows old—the earth is crumbling away—the night is far spent—the day is at hand. The shadows begin to move—the old forms of empire which have lasted ever since Christ was with us, heave and tremble before our eyes, and nod to their fall. When they go, Antichrist will be released from that which letteth, and will become the head of the countries of the ancient Roman empire, and after his short but fearful season, Christ will personally descend on this earth to commence his reign.

COMMUNION.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing April 28. John 14: 18-23.

WHAT is the secret of personal influence? How does the society of one person affect another? We know by experience that, apart from argument and conversation, a man is affected by the company he keeps. It is not so much in his opinions on certain subjects being changed, nor in his being convinced intellectually of the truth or falsity of certain theories or doctrines, as that the man himself is changed. Every man carries with him a moral atmosphere which is impregnated with the emanations of his inner life. Companionship and intimate association involve the influence of this moral atmosphere, and this influence would be felt even if the one person could not understand the language of the other. It operates for good and for evil. No man can be frequently in the society of good people, without becoming better, and no man can be familiar with bad people without becoming worse by the contact. The effect is increased and intensified by conversation, but it exists below the conversation, in the personal influence, the secret of which we do not understand. It is this personal influence which Christ uses to redeem men, in the highest sense of the word. He would have men in contact with himself. Christianity as a mere theological system, as a set of doctrines, cannot do much for a man. Even the threat of eternal punishment, or the prospect of eternal bliss cannot change a man's nature. His conduct may be affected by the prospect, but his nature is untouched. We have seen some children of irreproachable behavior whose faces indicate the probability of a future of crime and vice. Strict and severe parental training enforces good conduct, but the evil in their natures is only restrained and will break out when the restraint is removed. That is what the Apostle meant by speaking of "what the law could not do." "Thou shalt not, thou shalt not," could never produce the highest style of man. The man has not reached his highest development until he says of those things which are forbidden to him, "I would not do them even if I might, even if there were no prohibition and no evil consequences to follow." When a man has reached that stage, he is in a condition to enjoy heaven, and until he has reached it, he would be uncomfortable there. It is this deliberate choice of the good and the love of it, that God has been trying to produce in man. He does it, in our dispensation, by the power of Christ. He was in Christ reconciling the world to himself. It was not Christ's teaching, profound and philosophical as it was, that made Christianity the power which survived persecution and transforms men to this day. It was himself, [illegible] that gave it life. "I see it," the convert sometimes [illegible] when the doctrine of the Atonement is explained to him. He rejoices, but he often falls away into a worldly life afterward, and declares there is nothing in religion. But if his intellectual apprehension of the doctrine be followed by a contact with Christ, if he enters into companionship with him, which we call the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, he never falls away, and [illegible] power of Christianity. As the man who loves a pure, good, refined woman, whether she be mother, sister, or wife, and spends much of his time in her society, is disgusted, shocked and repelled by foul words, or vicious suggestions, so the man who has been within the sphere of Christ's influence hates all evil and hungers for righteousness. Even if that mother, sister or wife be far away on the other side of the world, or have passed into the unseen world, her influence is not extinct; and Christ's influence is infinitely more potent. We make a great mystery of the Holy Spirit, but there are plenty of our personal experiences that should make it comprehensible. But whatever difficulty there may be in understanding it, there is none in the experience. Christ's words have been fulfilled to thousands: "Ye shall know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you. Because I live, ye shall live also."

LEADERS IN THE BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION.

REV. HENRY W. REED. MR. WALTER E. GILLESPIE. REV. B. L. HERR.

LEADERS OF THE B. Y. P. U.

On this page are three portraits which will be welcome to our friends of the Baptist Young People's Union. The success of the movement and the vast influence it is attaining on the young people who in a few years will take their place in the van of the denomination, are largely due to the devotion and earnest efforts of men like those whose portraits we give, who in all parts of the country are consecrating time and talent to the cause.

Rev. Henry W. Reed who is now pastor of a Baptist Church at Waukeegan, Ill., is a native of New York and is forty years of age. He was converted in early ly life, and, on attaining his majority, determined to give his life to the service of God in the ministry. He studied at Colgate University and took a supplementary course in Union Theological Seminary. He labored successfully in two charges before settling in his present pastorate. One of these was at Wyoming, N. Y., and the other at Belvidere, Ill., in both of which his work amoung young people especially was blessed of God. He has now entered on his fifth year at Waukeegan, where the church is enjoying a wonderful season of prosperity under his ministry. Mr. Reed has been prominent in B. Y. P. U work from the beginning, and he is now a member of the Executive Committee of the National Council.

The B. Y. P. U. can use laymen as well as ministers and Mr. Walter E. Gillespie whose portrait is in the centre of the trio, is a conspicuous illustration of the fact. Mr. Gillespie is a Baptist by descent as well as by principle and conviction. He can boast of Baptist ancestry to several generations and one of his ancestors stood the test of being disinherited rather than abjure his faith. Mr. Gillespie is twenty-seven years of age and has been and still is one of the most enthusiastic of the younger leaders in the Union. He is a member of the Illinois Executive Committee, the Chicago Executive Committee and is President of the South Side District Union. He is also an active Sunday School worker and has for several years had charge of an important Mission Sunday School which, under his superintendence, has grown to a membership of five hundred.

Rev. B. L. Herr, the third member of the group, bears a name that will always be a honored one among Baptists, and indeed in the whole church of Christ. He is pastor of the First Baptist Church of Binghampton, N. Y. His father, Dr. J. D. Herr is the well known pastor of Norwich, Conn. Mr. Herr is a graduate of Rochester, where he was regarded as one of the most promising students. That promise has already been amply fulfilled, and as he is still a young man on the sunny side of forty, there is likely to be a still greater fulfilment in the future. At Binghampton, Mr. Herr's success has been phenomenal. The church has a membership of over a thousand, it maintains seven missions in other parts of the city and has a Christian Endeavor Society as well as a Young People's Union. Mr. Herr has taken a deep interest in the young people's work, and is one of the vice-Presidents of the New York State Union.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Constitution of the Junior Epworth League is being translated into Spanish for the use of the missions in Spain, Mexico and the Spanish-speaking countries of South America.

An excellent system has been adopted by the Epworth League of Stoneham, Mass. At regular intervals, letters are sent to persons who were formerly members of the Chapter, but who have now left the city. At a meeting called the absentees' meeting, held once in every six months, the answers of the absent members are read and are much enjoyed.

In the course of a recent address, Dr. F. E. Clark, President of the Christian Endeavor Society, said: "In the year which ended last June, it was found that the members of the societies in all parts of the country had given $250,000 through their own denominational missionary boards for the spread of the Gospel at home and abroad, and probably twice as much for local objects relating to their own church. This year it is believed they will give far more than that sum. Thirty different missionaries on the field belonging to the Presbyterian Board are supported by groups of Christian Endeavor Societies."

Seed for Western Farmers

Nebraska Appropriates $200,000, [illegible] Colorado's Seed Bill Fails — Close Notes of the General Relief Work.

IT will be welcome news to the read of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to le that the Nebraska Legislature, at long delay, has at last appropria $200,000 for the purchase of seed, a that Manager Ludden's Relief Co mission is apportioning the money direct the several counties. This practically en the troubles of the Nebraska farmers, fo season at least. In the Colorado Legisl ure, Hon. A. F. Peck, of Arapahoe coun introduced a bill appropriating $50,000 the purchase of seed and grain to be d tributed among the farmers in the "drou belt" in that State. The bill was pas by both houses, but vetoed by the Gove or as unconstitutional. There are ab five hundred farmers in Colorado who h neither seed nor money, and who will c sequently be unable to plant this spring.

Eastern seedsmen are forwarding con erable quantities of seeds to all the coun within the "drouth-belt." James J. Gregory & Son, of Marblehead, Ma who recently forwarded 800 lots of seed Manager Ludden at Lincoln, for distri tion to committees, in accordance with promise made through THE CHRISTI HERALD, write that they are now ov whelmed with applications for seed fr Kansas and South Dakota.

During the week a number of rep have been received from distributors, sho ing the relief work be practically closed the different States, the general condit more hopeful than any time within t past four months.

The story of a remarka and seemingly providen preservation from fam comes to us in a letter fr Enoch Jones, Oelrichs, Dak., who writes:

Our people would have been m worse off had it not been for a s of prairie land near the Nebr line, about six miles square, w there is no settlement. There w a local shower, causing the grass to grow so that people came as far as thirty miles to cut hay. O a number hauled it to Hot Springs, our county s to get groceries and clothing.

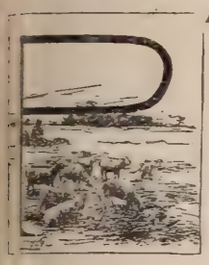
The Family and Home Circle

Music in Eastern Homes.

It is Very Different from Our Own, yet it has its Peculiar Charms.



PASSING through any Oriental city of considerable size, the traveler who is so fortunate as to be the guest for a time of some hospitable resident may expect to be entertained in a manner peculiar to the social life of the East. In Aleppo, Beyrout, Damascus or Cairo, the host is quite likely to arrange an evening concert of some sort for the amusement of the stranger. The photograph on this page was taken in an Eastern home on an occasion of this character, and represents a group of young Syrian musicians and singers. The leader, with an instrument somewhat resembling the zither, is accompanied by a tambourinist and a drummer, while the fourth is the soloist. All usually unite their voices at certain stages of the music in a chorus which bears close resemblance to a chant in unison than to a harmony in which the various parts are represented. Syrian music, though sometimes cheerful in character, is seldom sprightly. It never possesses that quality of genuine gayety that is so fluent a feature in the music of the West. Like the people themselves, their songs are in the main rather sad than otherwise, and are frequently marked by great dignity and beauty.

The Hebrews alone, of all the nations of the East, have been distinguished for musical taste and culture. They borrowed the harp from Egypt and Assyria, but they improved it greatly, as they did almost every other instrument they adopted, including the lyre, the lute, the sackbut, pipe, and timbrel. Their nation has also produced the finest musicians and the greatest composers of modern times, while the musical genius of other ancient Oriental peoples seems to have utterly died out.

Still more different is the music of the Syrians from that of the Arabs, who are probably the most melancholy people on earth, in a musical sense. Arab music represents a weary, monotonous discordance, strongly minor and anything but pleasing to the auditors. Even the Soudanese or the Central African tribes are more melodious, for they have harps, flutes, drums, trumpets, hollow gourds, and stringed instruments, altogether forming a rude and not inharmonious orchestra, which Schweinfurth, the famous traveler, declared sometimes produced music almost classical in quality. This remark, however, he applied only to the musical performances of a single tribe, the Bongoes, although other tribes are found with some pretensions to musical taste. But among the Arabs, once a great, powerful and wise people, hardly any evidence now remains to tell that they were ever appreciative of "the concord of sweet sounds."

Influence of the Christian Home.

A lighted lamp, wrote Rev. Dr. McCheyne, is a very small thing, and it burns calmly and without noise, yet it giveth light to all who are within the house. And so there is quiet influence which, like the flame of a scented lamp, fills many a home with light and fragrance. Such an influence has been beautifully compared to a carpet, soft and deep, which, while it diffuses a look of ample comfort, deadens many a creaking sound. It is the curtain which, from many a beloved form, wards off at once the summer's glow and the winter's wind. It is the pillow on which sickness lays its head and forgets half its misery. This influence falls as the refreshing dew, the invigorating sunbeam, the fertilizing shower, shining on all with the mild lustre of moonlight, and harmonizing in one soft tint many of the discordant hues of a family picture.

Peasant Women of the Rhine.

All along the roads, the traveler finds baby-carriages drawn up beside the fence, far from any house, writes James C. Fernald. Looking around for the reason, he will see the mother bent over the hoe, under the blazing sun, while the baby rolls in the furrow, and older children are playing near. There is no "traditional separation of the spheres of the sexes." This mother is emancipated. She has conquered the privilege of "doing a man's work" — poor thing! And she does it with a desperate, nervous energy that it tires you to look at a hundred yards away. But note her as she comes from the field at evening, and falls in with groups of her toiling sisterhood. They are all alike. Faces brown, drawn, hard with a wooden hardness, as if carved out of mahogany, with clatter of wooden shoes and unmelodious tongues, she comes with the grime of toil, with bedraggled gown and unkempt hair, bringing children dirty and hungry to a house to which she has not been able to do one thing since she dragged them out in the early morning. Now, what beauty or attraction can she impart to such a home? What womanly grace or fascination can she manifest? Home has become a mere place to lodge and eat. There is no home. The woman is kept beside the hearth with sheer weariness, and by the mother-love which holds her where her children are, but the man, less worn by the same toil, spends his evening at the beer-house. He has no idea of his wife being a companion. He knows her inferiority in physical strength, and her superiority in other things she has no chance to manifest. So he herds with men whom he respects as his equals, and never knows the grace and beauty which might come into his life were his wife released from unsuitable tasks.

Be Even Tempered.

Losing your temper takes all the sweetness out of life. You get up in the morning with a clean heart, full of song, and start out as happy as a bird, and the moment you are crossed and you give way to your temper, the clean feeling vanishes and a load as heavy as lead is rolled upon the heart, and you go through the rest of the day feeling like a culprit. And anyone who has experienced this feeling knows that it cannot be shaken off, but must be prayed off. If we want to be truly loved, we must not be unlovely in character and disposition. To some of us it seems to be so natural to find fault, if things do not go on according to our liking, that we make ourselves and those about us very unhappy by this fault-finding habit.

The Mother in the Sick-room.

When a boy gets sick away from home, writes a Chistian lady, he longs to see his mother. Her gentle touch and tender words are better than medicine. These soothe and quiet as nothing else in the world will. If you have sons away from home, you wish that those with whom they are may do unto other people's children, as they would have others do unto theirs. This is good law and good Gospel, too. It is the gist of religion on the human side of it. It keeps the conscience right toward God and void of offense toward man. How anxious parents are when their children are sick—especially when they are sick away from home. Then they come nearer knowing the heart of God than at any other time—his sympathy, his tenderness his Father-love.

HOME.

AS I thought of the home of my childhood,
And the dear friends so far, far away;
My heart grew heavy with sadness,
When I mused on that parting day.

Then I thought of the many mansions
That my Saviour has gone to prepare;
And it filled my heart with gladness,
For I know I'm invited there.

He says "be thou patient and faithful
And thy journeyings soon will be o'er,
And thou shalt rest in the Kingdom,
And dwell on the evergreen shore."

And thus I am patiently waiting.
For I know that my Saviour will come,
To establish his Kingdom eternal,
And that will be home, sweet home.

YOUNG COMPANIONSHIPS.

THE centre of companionships in a child's amusements ought to be the parents themselves. In the nature of things it is impossible for the parents to be a child's only companions in this line, or to be always his companions; but parents ought, in some way and at some time, to evince such an interest in their child's every amusement that he will feel that he is as close to his parents, and that his parents are as much to him, in this thing as in any other. If, indeed, a child had no companionship with his parents in his amusements, there would be reared a sad barrier between him and his parents in that sphere of his life which is largest and most attractive while he is at an age to be most impressible.

A true mother will show a hearty interest in her child's amusements, says H.C. Trumbull. She will encourage herself to feel that the time taken for this exhibit of her loving sympathy with him is by no means lost time. It may be harder for the father, than for the mother, to give the time or to show the interest essential to this duty; but he ought to secure the benefit of it in some way. A few minutes given to the little ones, as they are privileged to clamber into the father's room before he is up in the morning, and romp with him there, will do much to connect him pleasantly with their play. So, again, will a brief season at the close of the day, when he becomes acquainted with their special amusements, and shows that they are much to him, because they are much to his dear ones.

No companionship should be permitted to a child in his amusements that is likely to lower his moral tone, or to vitiate his moral taste. There are cases in which a parent is tempted to allow his children to be taken into a portion of the home establishment, or of the immediate neighborhood, in order that they may be amused by or with the children or the grown persons there, when he would be unwilling to have them under such influences or in such surroundings for any other purpose. This is a great mistake. The companionships of a child in the stable or at the street corner, while he is merely being amused, are likely to be quite as potent and pervasive as those which are around him in the parlor or the dining-room, at a time when his nature is not so actively and freely at its fullest play.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER XI.

Under Suspicion.

WHEN Alice entered the Wilson mansion a day or two after the events related in the last chapter, she was astonished by her reception. Mrs. Wilson had become transformed into a walking icicle. She was stiff and cold in her manner, and an icy glitter seemed lurking in her eye.

Alfreda, with a toss of her head and in a lofty but sneering manner, said, "I shall take no lesson to-day." Louie's eyes were very red; she appeared as if she had been crying. She was the only one who welcomed Alice, and her welcome was given in a sad tone of voice which denoted sympathy, bordering on pity. Not even Miss Emma would exchange greetings. Miss Emma was the third young lady and a cousin of the Wilson girls.

Alice was mystified; hardly a word was spoken during the lesson. At last, when Alice saw Louie wiping tears from her eyes (although the girl tried hard to hide them), she asked her why she was so sad, and the others so distant. "Perhaps," said Alice, "I do wrong in asking, but you are always so kind to me, that I cannot bear to see you with a troubled look on your face."

"Yes, dear," said Louie, in a whisper, "there is something wrong, but do not appear to notice it. I will tell you all about it some other time."

"Louie," said Mrs. Wilson, coming into the room, "do you remember when you last wore your diamond bracelet? Your sister says that the last time she remembers seeing it was when you took it off during your drawing lesson. Not the last one, but the one before that."

"Oh, I am sure I have worn it since then. I know I had it on a night or two ago. I remember noticing it sparkle while I was playing the piano."

"It is really very singular that it cannot be found," remarked Mrs. Wilson, still keeping her eyes fastened on Alice, but Alice did not notice the look, nor seem to pay any attention to the conversation.

Mrs. Wilson waited as if she expected an answer, so Miss Emma said, "Oh, it's perfectly——" whether she was going to say "lovely" or "dreadful" is not known. She did not seem to know which would be the proper word, and accordingly she wound up by drawling out her customary "y-e-s."

As Alice was leaving, Louie slipped a note into her hand. Opening it on her way home, the perusal of its contents only served to mystify her. This was what she read:

MY DEAR ALICE.—Do not feel hurt or offended at your cool reception at our house to-day. I could see that you noticed it. Something has happened which has put us all in a bad temper. Women are sometimes [illegible] and unjust in their judgment [illegible] another. I believe that it will be all right before long, even before we meet again. Remember always that I am your friend, and trust you and love you sincerely. Your Friend, LOUIE."

"What does she mean?" thought Alice, "and how can I possibly be mixed up with any of their troubles? I no sooner begin to enjoy a little beam of sunlight, than another cloud settles down over my limited horizon, and it always seems that the last is blacker, more dense and chilling than the former ones."

As soon as Alice had left the house, Louie began to cry, and upbraid her mother. "Oh, mamma, how could you say such dreadful things before Alice."

"I do wish you would stop your crying, and not show yourself to be so very soft, and unsophisticated. If you would manifest a little more sorrow for the loss of your beautiful bracelet (the gift of your dear father, and not so much over that good-for-nothing creature, you would please me better, and prove that you had some sound [illegible]

"I shall never like it again as long as I live," said Louie, impatiently, "and I would rather lose all the jewelry I have than that you should charge that poor girl with being a thief."

Nettie, the new ladies' maid, was "doing up" Mrs. Wilson's hair during the conversation, and it might have been noticed that she took a great interest in what was being said, and would often change color. Apparently she was very much excited, for she was performing a very bad piece of workmanship on her lady's head. Several times during the operation the lady had to remonstrate with her, once when Nettie was trying to run a long dart of silver into her ear, instead of through the coil of hair, where it was intended to go; and again when she dropped three hair-pins down the neck of the lady's dress.

"Please do not make me angry, Louie. I pride myself upon being a judge of character, and I took a dislike to the girl before I had known her an hour. I saw clearly that she had never been used to good society, and that all her lady-like ways were mere imitations, and very poor ones at that. When it comes to matters of good breeding, I am never deceived. I can always tell the genuine from the counterfeit." Delivering herself of this important speech, Mrs. Wilson gave her head a toss, as much as to say, "that settles the matter."

"I cannot understand how you could come to such conclusions, mamma, I had not known her an hour before I began to love her. I know that she is a pure and beautiful girl."

"That," said the mother, "only goes to show how easily you have been deceived by a designing, unprincipled creature."

"Well, I never knew her do or say, a sly or wrong thing. She is always outspoken and lady-like, yet always unassuming; is she not Emma?" said Louie.

"Oh, she's perfectly lovely," said that young lady, who seemed a little startled by the question. Then catching Mrs. Wilson's eye, she added, "Oh, its perfectly dreadful!"

"Well, my dear," answered Mrs. Wilson, "to show you how little she deserves all the flattering things you have said of her, I will explain a few things. In the first place, she is here under an assumed name; I learned that from Mr. Jackson. He says that her name is not Brown as she told us. He doesn't know what her real name is,—then he tells me that he has heard of her in several places, and that she has always left a bad record behind her."

"When did Mr. Jackson ever see her here?" asked Louie.

"He saw her come in here the other day and asked what I knew of her character, and then when the bracelet was lost, he said that was easily explained, and that he could guess where it went, and who took it."

"Perhaps he could," said Louie, getting red in the face, while Nettie turned deathly white, "I would as easily suppose that he stole it as that Alice did, in fact it is more likely that he did; for he shows by his mean insinuations that he is no gentleman, to dare talk in that manner of a fatherless girl; and behind her back, too; that proves that he is a coward and a villain."

"How dare you talk in that way of a gentleman like Mr. Jackson?" said Alfreda, stamping her foot upon the carpet.

"I would thank you, Louie, never again in my presence to speak such words of a gentleman whom I honor and esteem, and who is, as you know, as good as engaged to your sister." said Mrs. Wilson.

Then she gave a sharp scream, for Nettie, who had about completed her work on that lady's head, had caught her hair with a spasmodic grip that had disarranged the hair and given her a sharp twinge.

"Oh! I beg your pardon—I—I—" and the girl burst into tears.

"What in the world is the matter with you?" asked Mrs. Wilson, in an angry tone.

"I don't know, ma'am, but I'm afraid I have the Grippe. Chills keep running all over me."

It feels very much like the grip to me," said Mrs. Wilson, as she put her hand to her head. "You had better go and lie down for awhile, and take a hot drink as well." Nettie accepted the proffered advice, and seemed very glad to make her escape.

"Well, mamma," said Louie, "do not say any more about the affair for a few days, perhaps by that time we shall find the bracelet."

"We shall do nothing of the kind. That girl has it, and I have determined to tell her to bring it back, and if she denies the theft and refuses, I shall then have her arrested. Mr. Jackson says it is a duty I owe to society, and the only way with such as she. He says there need be no publicity about the matter; for when she is arrested, he will see her, and he feels sure he will be able to frighten a confession out of her, and secure the bracelet."

Oh, it is cruel; I believe Mr. Jackson is playing a cowardly trick—and—and—" Louie ran out of the room in a passion of tears.

"Well, mamma, what are we coming to, when that girl will use such language in speaking of a respectable gentleman, and in defence of an unknown creature like that girl Alice. Louie is getting lower and lower in her tastes every day. I hear that she now wants to join the W. C. T. U." Alfreda.

"Oh, its perfectly dreadful," said Emma.

"What is the W. C. T. U., may I ask?"

Oh, some sort of a temperance society, I believe," replied Alfreda.

"Well," answered the mother, "that child has always had a leaning toward popular but low societies, such as mission schools, hospitals, and a lot of others. I don't know where she got such ideas, and her father has always taken her part in arguments concerning these things, and maintained that she was right, so I have given up talking about them. But in this affair I am going to have my own way; if only to show her that her mother knows what is right, and is a better judge of human nature and impostors than she is. I hope the lesson will do her good."

"Oh, its perfectly dreadful, Auntie," chimed in Emma in her senseless tone.

CHAPTER XII.

Counter-Plot.

Mr. Wilson was one of those successful business men, who had made a fortune from very small beginnings. He was an energetic, honest and liberal man, he never interfered with household matters, but left all to his wife; she was queen of his splendid mansion, as he was king of a prosperous business establishment.

That night Mrs. Wilson told him of the lost bracelet, her suspicions, and her intended steps in the matter.

"I would go slow, my dear," he said, "I would much rather get Louie another bracelet than that any innocent person should suffer, and especially a girl who has to earn her living, more especially when the girl is a friend of Louie's."

"But you know," replied Mrs. Wilson, "she is a hired teacher of whom we know nothing. Louie has taken a fancy to her, because the cunning creature has made professions of love; you know it is Louie's great failing that she believes every pitiful story that she hears, and is always looking down instead of up."

"Well, dear, we will not discuss the matter," said Mr. Wilson, "but I can't agree with you in relation to Louie. I think the girl shows a wonderful knowledge of human nature, in her likes and dislikes, and I must say that I think she is right in her dislike of that man Jackson; I never did like him myself. By the way, did you know that Will Mapleton, his partner's son, had been killed in a battle with the Indians, out in New Mexico? He was one of the finest young fellows I ever knew and if his father had not died, and the firm failed, I believe Louie and he would have made a match. I think they loved each other, but I suppose she has got over all that by this time."

"Oh, pray do not mention it to Louie," said Mrs. Wilson, "I believes she loves him as much now as when he left; in fact, I think she was more in love with him after the failure, than when he was wealthy. But of course, I would not hear of a marriage under the circumstances, and I must say to his credit, that he agreed with me, and promised to not even write to her until he was able to support her as a lady. He left her perfectly free, still, I have always had a suspicion, that there was an unspoken agreement between them, for I noti[ce] that she discourages all her suitors."

"Well, I am very sorry, if she and W[ill] really were attached," said Mr. Wilso[n] "for it will almost break her heart, and [I] to your objection to him that would be r[e]moved. Graham tells me if he were ali[ve] he might be better off than ever. He is tr[y]ing to find Will's mother; you know, sh[e] was a proud woman, and since the wrec[k] she and her daughter disappeared, and n[o] the slightest trace of them has been foun[d] Well, they were very kind to us when [we] were not so well off."

"Yes," said Mrs. Wilson, "but I ha[ve] not met Mrs. Mapleton for years, and ha[d] never met her daughter. You remembe[r] Will met us abroad and returned by t[he] same steamer as we did, and it was only [a] few weeks after our arrival home, that th[e] failed."

Mr. Wilson was troubled that night wi[th] thoughts that interfered with his rest; [he] never meddled with any of his wife's [a]rangements, yet, in this case, witho[ut] knowing the particulars, he found hims[elf] sympathizing with Louie. The next mor[n]ing as soon as he reached his office, he se[nt] for Mr. Graham; to him he told the wh[ole] story of the lost bracelet, his wife's su[s]picions of the teacher, Louie's confiden[ce] in her, and how he was inclined to sym[pa]thize with his daughter, but made it a r[u]le never to interfere with his wife's plans."

"Now, Graham," he said, "I want y[ou] to look the thing up, but don't go to t[he] house for any information, for I do n[ot] want my wife to know that I have intere[st]ed myself in the affair. I can describe t[he] article lost" (and he did so), "and Graha[m] should my wife be correct in her suspicio[n] and you think the girl is guilty, do not arr[est] her, make it as easy as possible. I say th[is] for the sake of my own girls."

"I am much obliged to you, Mr. Wilso[n] for telling me all this. You may find th[at] this little affair is of more importance to [y]ou than you think."

An hour after this coversation, Mr. G[ra]ham stepped into Mr. Jacobs' establishme[nt] "Ah, Mr. Graham, how vas you dis mo[r]in'? I vas glat to see you, altho' I supp[ose] it vas some bad beesness you vas looki[ng] after dot bring you here."

"Yes, Mr. Jacobs, you know I never b[e]at about the bush with you. I know that y[ou] are an honest man, and I wish all men [in] your business were like you, so I alwa[ys] tell you at once what I am after. In t[his] case, it is a bracelet, peculiar in its je[w]setting, four forget-me-nots formed w[ith] turquoise, and diamond centres, and [the] leaves formed with emeralds."

"Yes, dot is it, and dot bracelet give [me] some troubles, ven I tink about it, beca[use] I vas pretty sure dere vas someting [not] right about it, already."

"Now," said Graham, "will you ple[ase] tell me how you came by it; well, all y[ou] know about it."

"Vell, I don't know much. I vas at [a] tea, and my poy took it, and all the k[no]wledge I vant vas two dollars. Now, you tell [me] vat vas de matter 'bout de ting, anywa[y]."

"It was stolen," said Graham as he [ex]amined the bracelet, "and there is someth[ing] very queer about it."

"Vell, I should tink so. I lose two dol[lars] and it is queer, but I vas glat dat she [did] not make ten."

"Well," said Graham, "I shall try [to] make it ten for you the other way. N[ow] what name did she give?"

"Here is the name she gave, but de n[ame] dey give ven dey only vant two dollar [or] fifty-dollar article, you cannot depend [on] already."

Mr. Graham was paying little or no [at]tention to what Mr. Jacobs' was sayi[ng] he was staring at the name written i[n] book, with a puzzled, almost frighte[ned] look upon his face. At last he said slow[ly] aloud and yet to himself, as if he doub[ted] his eyes, and wanted to be convinced [by] his ears, "Alice Mapleton," to which [he] added a long, low whistle."

"Vell! You seem to take some aston[ish]ment by dat name, Mr. Graham?"

"Well, I should think so," answered [the] detective, "and if I am not mistaken [it] will see some fun. This bracelet is a ba[it] catch somebody and get them into trou[ble] and may catch somebody else. Some [peo]ple are too smart and are apt to ov[er]do things."

"Vell, yes; and lots of people ain't sm[art] enuff to do anytings."

"Well, Mr. Jacobs, I'll take care of [the] thing, and you keep mum. Not a wor[d] anybody."

Now is the Time to Think of a Change in the Spring.

Your attention will soon be directed to the spring time and its prospects. If you are dissatisfied with your present condition and circumstances, and are desirous of making a change, why not think of getting a piece of land. You can get a farm in northern Wisconsin, where there is no better chance offered anywhere for a new beginner and so little money needed, which will soon make you feel independent. Write for information about land and how to get work at the same time, to Fred'k Abbot, Land Com'nr., W. C. R. R., Milwaukee, Wis.

Special Offer
Limited to May 15.

No business or professional man, teacher, housewife, student, or any other person interested in self-education, or who may feel the need of a dictionary or encyclopedia, can afford to allow this great opportunity to secure a whole reference library at about one-sixth its former value pass by without careful investigation. The new, revised and enlarged which formerly sold at from $42 to $50 per set is now offered all readers of The Christian Herald for $1.87½ per volume, or $7.50 for the complete set of 4 volumes. All orders must be received before May 15th or not at all.

This most modern and up to date of all reference libraries was edited by ROBERT HUNTER, A. M., F. G., S. assisted by scores of specialists.

Revised, enlarged and brought down to date by Professor CHAS. MORRIS of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences, and many other world-renowned scholars.

After May 15th, the price will be from $16 to $24 per set, and absolutely no discounts will be allowed.

The above illustration is an exact reproduction of the four magnificent volumes of the ENCYCLOPÆDIC DICTIONARY, bound in rich silk cloth, with gilt back stamp, handsomely embossed sides, and marbled edges. Each volume 9 inches wide, 11½ inches long, 3 inches thick. Weight, about 40 pounds.

Satisfaction Guaranteed or money refunded within 10 days.

Over 17 years and $750,000.00 required in the production of this Magnificent Monument of Education.

We ask every purchaser to speak of the work to his or her friends, and to send us a testimonial,—this being a condition of this special offer.

It is a Complete Dictionary, containing every word in the English language (250,000 in all), which no other dictionary does. Every word is exhaustively treated as to its origin, history, development, etymology, pronunciation and various meanings.

It is a Thorough Encyclopædia of anatomy, botany, chemistry, zoology, geology, art, music, agriculture, physics, philosophy, mechanics, history, mythology, Biblical knowledge, and every other subject known to the human intellect.

It is a Superb Library Book, being substantially and attractively bound, printed from new plates, in large clear type, on heavy white paper, and illustrated with hundreds of new pictures made especially for this work.

The Four Volumes aggregate a total of 5,357 pages. Contains 130,000 more words than Worcester, 110,000 more than Webster, 35,000 more than the Century, and costs less than any of them.

WHAT GOOD JUDGES SAY ABOUT THE WORK.

I prize highly The Encyclopædic Dictionary for the number of words it contains, for accuracy of definition, for fulness of illustrations, and for encyclopædic comprehensiveness.
Bishop Samuel Fallows,
Chicago, Ill.

As a reference book it stands in the front rank. As a dictionary it meets every demand.
Rev. G. W. Rose,
Atchison, Kan.

The Encyclopædic Dictionary opens the dictionary [illegible] the Century, the Standard and the International. [illegible]
Philadelphia Inquirer.

My library contains the Century and the latest Webster, but I have found much information in "The Encyclopædic" not in either of the former. I regard the work as invaluable.
Frank W. Owens,
Judge 5th Judicial District, Colo.

I consider The Encyclopædic Dictionary superior to Webster, Worcester, Century, or Standard. For the busy lawyer, who wants to know things quickly, a better reference book could be had.
Benjamin F. Hughes,
Attorney and ex-State Senator, Philadelphia.

I have Webster, Worcester and the Century, and for encyclopædias I have the Britannica and Appletons. It is but simple truth to say that the Encyclopædic Dictionary is a magnificent substitute for all of them.
S. H. Atwood,
Attorney, Leavenworth, Kan.

"GENTLEMEN—Regarding prospects for the coming year, would say, we hope to double our last year's output of Aermotors, or, at least, as we have done in the past, sell twenty-four out of every twenty-five windmills that are sold. Since commencing the sale in 1889, WE HAVE SOLD ABOUT

500 AERMOTORS

We do not attribute this fairly good record entirely to our efforts, but to the superiority of the goods which you make. BURRILL & DAVIS. Urbana, Ill., February 18, 1895."

GENTLEMEN—We bought and put up Aermotor No. 2, and out of the first fifty which you made we had thirteen. Since that time we have sold about

400 AERMOTORS

In our small territory is represented the history of the Aermotor and the Aermotor Company from the beginning to the present hour. That history is one of unbroken triumph. Aside from the Aermotor there have been but few other windmills put up in our territory—just enough with which to compare and show the infinite superiority of the Aermotor in design, workmanship, finish (all galvanized after completion), and ability to run and do effective work when all others stand idle for want of wind. We should have sold more, but this region was well supplied with wind power when the Aermotor appeared, it being only 66 miles to Chicago, and had for years been the battle ground for ten or twelve of the largest, best known and strongest windmill companies, all being located within 50 miles of us. MUCH OF OUR BUSINESS HAS COME FROM RE-PLACING WOODEN AND OTHER UNSATISFACTORY WHEELS WITH AERMOTORS. You say you have during the past year surpassed any previous year's record by about one-half and that you expect to double your last year's output the coming year. Count on us for our portion of it, for the Aermotor never stood farther above all competitors in reputation and in fact than to-day. SAMUEL BAUGH, Marengo, Ill., February 25, 1895."

A LIGHT AMONG THE HEATHEN.

ssionary Work Along the River Niger—A Land of Many Gods and Human Sacrifices—The Rebellious Brassmen—Bishop Tugwell's Labors at Lagos.

IN no part of the heathen world is the glorious Gospel of Jesus Christ being carried forward with greater zeal and activity, at the present time, than in Western Equatorial Africa. Especially has the attention Christian communities been directed rtly to the Niger country, where impor- nt events have taken place within the last w weeks. Although the Gold Coast and e Ivory Coast, which lie contiguous to at country on the Western seaboard of e great continent, have for many ars been fields of missionary terprise, the Slave Coast for rious reasons has not en so fortunate in Gos- advantages. Within e last fifteen years, wever, the Church ssionary Society of gland has made ex lent progress, plant- new mission sta- ns, and generally adening and devel- ing the work. The ntre of its activity the Yoruba Mission, ith stations along Niger and far into e interior, through a rk land of heathen- n and cruelty; a land plific in kings and ds, and rude tem- s with altars where- are offered human crifices. It is a land king with slaughter the name of reli- on, and where can- alism and infanti- le are still very gen- lly practiced by the tives.

Few parts of Africa fer a more inviting ld for exploration d missionary work an the Niger coun- . From the point ere the great river pties into the Gulf Guinea at Akassa, to the Hombori ountains, southeast Timbuctoo, and thin the confines of e great Sahara des- , it is a land of pict- re sque savageism. ke the other sec- ns of tropical and quatorial Africa, it ars the marks of the rse of slavery; but re, unlike the slave de of the East oast, the curse came rough contact with ropean nations. rom Brass, near the iger's mouth, to ape Coast Castle, in shanti, on the oppos- shore of the Bight Benin, is a long, rving stretch of sea- ast, known as the ave Coast. In the entre of the curve, and close upon the low hore, is Lagos, one of the most available stations selected by the Church Missionary Society for Gospel work along the West Coast, and the base of the Yoruba Mission, which is embraced in the Sierra Leone diocese. With this exception, the Yoruba and Niger Missions are within the territory included in the conventional diocese of the "Bishop in Western Equatorial Africa," the title by which the Archbishop of Canterbury chose to designate the successor of the colored Bishop Crowther, who was known as "Bishop of the Niger Territories." When Bishop Crowther was appointed to the work, it was believed that no white man could fill the post and escape death or invalidism after a short term of labor. But experience has gradually modified this opinion, and although the whole territory along the Gulf of Guinea, and for some distance inland, is proverbially deadly, in a climatic sense, for Europeans, there are a few stations whose situation and surroundings are such as to greatly lessen the danger.

Like other large African rivers, the Niger has many trading stations, the residents of which are sometimes cut off for months from all communication with the coast settlements. For miles on either side of the river the country is a vast swamp, and the vegetation is so dense that the sunlight cannot penetrate the darkness. Farther up the river, the banks are higher and the swamps give place to lovely banana and plantain farms. Nearly all the villages are situated near the riverside and the chief occupation of the natives is fishing. This general description applies to the territory along the Niger, occupied by the Brass natives, who have lately given much trouble to the missionaries and traders. The Brassmen are skilful navigators and the numerous inlets, creeks and bays that penetrate the dense jungles of their country give them a powerful advantage over an enemy who is unable to attack them by land. In common with other tribes, they have been aggrieved by the monopoly of trade by various companies, which has reduced the revenues of their chiefs, and their discontent culminated in a recent attack on one of the Royal Niger Company's trading stations at Akassa, on the coast. Their old-fashioned rifles, 1500 in number, would have been comparatively harmless had not a machine gun, used at the station for purposes of defence, broken down early in the fight that followed. The station men sought refuge in a verandah, while the Brassmen looted the building. The assailants were driven off next morning by a relieving force, after which a punitive expedition went to Nimbi, a Brass village, killed the people and burned the dwellings.

AFTER THE BATTLE.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., preached last Sunday on the Text: I. Sam. 31: 8: "And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came to strip the slain, that they found Saul and his three sons fallen in Mount Gilboa."

SOME of you were at South Mountain, or Shiloh, or Ball's Bluff, or Gettysburg, on Northern or Southern side, and I ask you if there is any sadder sight than a battle-field after the guns have stopped firing? I walked across the field of Antietam just after the conflict! The scene was so sickening I shall not describe it. Every valuable thing had been taken from the bodies of the dead, for there are always vultures hovering over and around about an army, and they pick up the watches and the memorandum books, and the letters, and the daguerreotypes, and the hats and the coats, applying them to their own uses. The dead make no resistance. So there are always camp followers going on and after an army, as when Scott went down into Mexico, as when Napoleon marched up toward Moscow, as when Von Moltke went to Sedan. There is a similar scene in my text.

Saul and his army had been horribly cut to pieces. Mount Gilboa was ghastly with the dead. On the morrow the stragglers came on to the field, and they lifted the latchet of the helmet from under the chin of the dead, and they picked up the swords and bent them on their knee to test the temper of the metal, and they opened the wallets and counted the coin. Saul lay dead along the ground, eight or nine feet in length, and I suppose the cowardly Philistines, to show their bravery, leaped upon the trunk of his carcass, and jeered at the fallen slain, and whistled through the mouth of his helmet. Before night those cormorants had taken everything valuable from the field: "And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came to strip the slain, that they found Saul and his three sons fallen in Mount Gilboa."

Before I get through to-day I will show you that the same process is going on all the world over, and every day, and that when men have fallen, Satan and the world, so far from pitying them or helping them, go to work remorselessly to take what little there is left, thus stripping the slain.

There are tens of thousands of young men every year coming from the country to our great cities. They come with brave hearts and grand expectations. The country lads sit down in the village grocery, with their feet on the iron rod around the red-hot stove, in the evening, talking over the prospects of the young man who has gone off to the city. Two or three of them think that perhaps he may get along very well and succeed, but the most of them prophesy failure, for it is very hard to [illegible] boyhood will ever make any great success in the world.

But our young man has a fine position in a dry-goods store. The month is over. He gets his wages. He is not accustomed to [illegible] himself. He is a little excited, and does not know exactly what to do with it, and he spends it in some places where he ought not. Soon there come up new companions and acquaintances from the bar-rooms and the saloons of the city. Soon that young man begins to waver in the battle of temptation, and soon his soul goes down. In a few months, or few years, he has fallen. He is morally dead. He is a mere corpse of what he once was. The harpies of sin snuff up the taint and come on the field. His garments gradually give out. He has pawned his watch. His health is failing him. His credit perishes. He is too poor to stay in the city, and he is too poor to pay his way home to the country. Down! down! Why do the low fellows of the city now stick to him so closely? Is it to help him back to a moral and spiritual life? Oh, no! I will tell you why they stay; they are Philistines stripping the slain.

Do not look where I point, but yonder stands a man who once had a beautiful home in this city. His house had elegant furniture, his children were beautifully clad, his name was synonymous with honor and usefulness; but evil habit knocked at his front door, knocked at his back door, knocked at his parlor door, knocked at his bedroom door. Where is the piano? Sold to pay the rent. Where is the hat-rack? Sold to meet the butcher's bill. Where are the carpets? Sold to get bread. Where is the wardrobe? Sold to get rum! Where are the daughters? Working their fingers off in trying to keep the family together. Worse and worse until everything is gone. Who is that going up the front steps of that house? That is a creditor, hoping to find some chair or bed that has not been levied upon. Who are those two gentlemen now going up the front steps? The one is a constable, the other is the sheriff. Why do they go there? The unfortunate is morally dead, socially dead, financially dead. Why do they go there? I will tell you why the creditors, and the constables, and the sheriffs go there. They are, some on their own account, and some on account of the law, stripping the slain.

An ex-member of Congress, one of the most eloquent men that ever stood in the House of Representatives, said in his last moments: "This is the end. I am dying—dying on a borrowed bed, covered by a borrowed sheet, in a house built by public charity. Bury me under that tree in the middle of the field, where I shall not be crowded, for I have been crowded all my life." Where were the jolly politicians and the dissipating comrades who had been with him, laughing at his jokes, applauding his eloquence, and plunging him into sin? They have left. Why? His money is gone, his reputation is gone, his wit is gone, his clothes are gone, everything is gone. Why should they stay any longer? They have completed their work. They have stripped the slain.

There is another way, however, of doing that same work. Here is a man who, through his sin, is prostrate. He acknowledges that he has done wrong. Now is the time for you to go to that man and say: "Thousands of people have been as far astray as you are, and got back." Now is the time for you to go to that man and tell him of the omnipotent grace of God, that is sufficient for any poor soul. Now is the time to go to tell him how swearing John Bunyan, through the grace of God, afterward came to the Celestial City. Now is the time to go to that man and tell him how profligate Newton came, through conversion, to be a world-renowned preacher of righteousness. Now is the time to tell that man that multitudes who have been pounded with all the flails of sin and dragged through all the sewers of pollution, at last have risen to positive dominion of moral power.

You do not tell him that, do you? No. You say to him: "Loan you money? No. You are down. You will have to go to the dogs. Lend you a dollar? I would not lend you five cents to keep you from the gallows. You are debauched! Get out of my sight, now! Down; you will have to stay down!" And thus those bruised and battered men are sometimes accosted by those who ought to lift them up. Thus the last vestige of hope is taken from them. Thus those who ought to go and lift and save them, are guilty of stripping the slain.

The point I want to make is this: sin is hard, cruel, and merciless. Instead of helping a man up, it helps him down; and when, like Saul and his comrades, you lie on the field, it will come and steal your sword and helmet and shield, leaving you to the jackal and the crow.

But the world and Satan do not do all their work with the outcast and abandoned. A respectable impenitent man comes to die. He is flat on his back. He could not get up if the house was on fire. Adroitest medical skill and gentlest nursing have been a failure. He has come to his last hour. What does Satan do for such a man? Why, he fetches up all the inapt, disagreeable, and harrowing things in his life. He says: "Do you remember those chances you had for heaven, and missed them? Do you remember all those lapses in conduct? Do you remember all those opprobrious words and thoughts and actions? Don't remember them, eh? I'll make you remember them." And then he takes all the past and empties it on that death-bed, as the mail-bags are emptied on the post-office floor. The man is sick. He cannot get away from them.

Then the man says to Satan: "You have deceived me. You told me that all would be well. You said there would be no trouble at the last. You told me if I did so and so, you would do so and so. Now you corner me, and hedge me up, and submerge me in everything evil." Ha! ha!" says Satan, "I was only fooling you. It is mirth for me to see you suffer. I have been for thirty years plotting to get you just where you are. It is hard for you now—it will be worse for you after awhile. It pleases me. Lie still, sir. Don't flinch or shudder. Come, now, I will tear off from you the last rag of expectation. I will rend away from your soul the last hope. I will leave you bare for the beating of the storm. It is my business to strip the slain."

While men are in robust health, and their digestion is good, and their nerves are strong, they think their physical strength will get them safely through the last exigency. They say it is only cowardly women who are afraid at the last, and cry out for God. "Wait till I come to die. I will show you. You won't hear me pray, nor call for a minister, nor want a chapter read me from the Bible." But after the man has been three weeks in a sick-room his nerves are not so steady, and his worldly companions are not anywhere near to cheer him up, and he is persuaded that he must quit life: his physical courage is all gone.

He jumps at the fall of a teaspoon in a saucer. He shivers at the idea of going away. He says: "Wife, I don't think my infidelity is going to take me through. For God's sake don't bring up the children to do as I have done. If you feel like it, I wish you would read a verse or two out of Fannie's Sabbath School hymn-book or New Testament." But Satan breaks in and says, "You have always thought r[eligion] trash and a lie; don't give up at th[e] last. Besides that, you cannot, in the ho[ur] you have to live, get off on that track. D[o] as you lived. With my great black wing I shut out that light. Die in darkness rend away from you that last vestige [of] hope. It is my business to strip the slain.

A man who had rejected Christianit[y] and thought it all trash, came to die. H[e] was in the sweat of a great agony, and h[is] wife said: "We had better have some pra[y]er." "Mary, not a breath of that," he sai[d] "The lightest word of prayer would r[e]back on me like rocks on a drowning ma[n] I have come to the hour of test. I had [a] chance, but I forfeited it. I believed in liar, and he has left me in the lurch. Mar[y] bring me Tom Paine, that book that swore by and lived by, and pitch it into t[he] fire, and let it burn and burn as I myse[lf] shall soon burn." And then, with the foa[m] on his lip and his hands tossing wildly the air, he cried out: "Blackness of dar[k]ness! Oh, my God, too late!" And t[he] spirits of darkness whistled up from t[he] depth, and wheeled around and around hi[m] stripping the slain.

Sin is a luxury now; it is exhilaratio[n] now; it is victory now. But after awh[ile] it is collision; it is defeat; it is extermin[a]tion; it is jackalism; it is robbing the dea[d] it is stripping the slain. Give it up to-da[y] —give it up! Oh, how you have be[en] cheated on, my brother, from one thing another! All these years you have be[en] under an evil mastery that you understo[od] not. What have your companions done f[or] you? What have they done for your healt[h] Nearly ruined it by carousal. What ha[s] they done for your fortune? Almost sc[a]tered it by spendthrift behavior. Wh[at] have they done for your reputation? A[l]most ruined it with good men. What ha[s] they done for your immortal soul? Almo[st] insured its overthrow.

You are hastening on toward the co[n]summation of all that is sad. To-day y[ou] stop and think, but it is only for a momen[t] and then you will tramp on, and at the clo[se] of this service you will go out, and the que[s]tion will be: "How did you like the s[er]mon?" And one man will say: "I lik[e] it very well," and another man will sa[y] "I didn't like it at all;" but neither of the a[n]swers will touch the tremendous fact, th[at] if impenitent, you are going at thirty kn[ots] an hour toward shipwreck! Yea, you a[re] in a battle where you will fall; and wh[en] your surviving relatives will take your r[e]maining estate, and the cemetery will ta[ke] your body, the messengers of darkness w[ill] take your soul, and come and go about y[ou] stripping the slain.

Many are crying out: "I admit I a[m] slain, I admit it!" On what battle-fie[ld] my brothers? By what weapon? "Poi[so]ted imagination," says one man; "Into[xi]cating liquor," says another man; "M[y] own hard heart," says another man. D[o] you realize this? Then I come to tell y[ou] that the omnipotent Christ is ready to wa[lk] across this battle-field, and revive, and [re]suscitate, and resurrect your dead soul. L[et] him take your hand and rub away t[he] numbness; your head, and bathe off t[he] aching; your heart and stop its wild thr[ob] He brought Lazarus to life; he brou[ght] Jairus' daughter to life; he brought t[he] young man of Nain to life, and these a[re] three proofs anyhow that he can bring y[ou] to life.

When the Philistines came down on t[he] field, they stepped between the corpses, a[nd] they rolled over the dead, and they to[ok] away everything that was valuable; a[nd] so it was with the people that followed a[f]ter the armies at Chancellorsville, and [at] Pittsburg Landing, and at Stone River, a[nd] at Atlanta, stripping the slain; but t[he] Northern and Southern women—God bl[ess] them!—came on the field with basins, a[nd] pads, and towels, and lint, and cordia[l] and Christian encouragement; and t[he] poor fellows that lay there lifted up th[eir] arms and said: "Oh, how good that d[oes] feel since you dressed it!" and others loo[ked] ed up and said: "Oh, how you make thk of my mother!" and others said: "ell the folks at home I died thinking aut them;" and another looked up and sa: "Miss, won't you sing me a verse of 'me, Sweet Home,' before I die?" And th the tattoo was sounded, and the hats we off, and the service was read: "I am thresurrection and the life;" and in honor ofhe departed the muskets were loaded, ar the command given, "Present—fire!" A there was a shingle set up at the head ofhe grave, with the epitaph of "Lieuten-ar—— in the Fourteenth Massachusetts Rulars," or "Captain —— in the Fif-te-th Regiment of South Carolina Volun-tes." And so now, across this great field ofnoral and spiritual battle, the angels of G come walking among the slain, and the are voices of comfort, and voices of hce, and voices of resurrection, and voices of eaven.

ne night I saw a tragedy on the corner of roadway and Houston street. A young m, evidently doubting as to which direc-tid he had better take, his hat lifted high enigh so that you could see he had an in-telgent forehead, stout chest; he had a ro-bu development. Splendid young man. Cured young man. Honored young m. Why did he stop there while so many we going up and down? The fact is, th every man has a good angel ar a bad angel contending for the m tery of his spirit, and there was a od angel and a bad angel strug-glz with that young man's soul at thorner of Broadway and Hous-tostreet. "Come with me," said thgood angel; "I will take you hce; I will spread my wings over yc pillow; I will lovingly escort yeall through life under supernat-ur protection; I will bless every cu you drink out of, every couch yd rest on, every doorway you en-fer will consecrate your tears when ydweep, your sweat when you toil, anat the last I will hand over your gre into the hand of the bright an-gef a Christian resurrection. In anver to your father's petition and yc mother's prayer, I have been se of the Lord out of heaven to be yc guardian spirit. Come with m" said the good angel in a voice of nearthly symphony. It was mu-sicke that which drops from a lute of eaven when a seraph breathes ort. "No, no," said the bad angel, "ne with me; I have something be'r to offer; the wines I pour are fr chalices of bewitching carousal; th ance I lead is over floor tessella-tewith unrestrained indulgences; the is no God to frown on the tem-ple of sin where I worship. The skies ar talian. The paths I tread are through mdows, daisied and primrosed. Come wi me." The young man hesitated at a tin when hesitation was ruin, and the baangel smote the good angel until it de-pard, spreading wings through the star-lig upward and away until a door flashed op in the sky and forever the wings van-isl. That was the turning point in that yog man's history; for, the good angel flon, he hesitated no longer, but started om pathway which is beautiful at the op ing, but blasted at the last. The bad anel, leading the way, opened gate after ga, and at each gate the road became ro her and the sky more lurid, and what wa peculiar, as the gate slammed shut it ..cae to with a jar that indicated that it wld never open. Passed each portal, the was a grinding of locks and a shov-inof bolts; and the scenery on either side of he road changed from gardens to des-ert and the June air became a cutting Dember blast, and the bright wings of th bad angel turned to sackcloth, and the ey of light became hollow with hopeless gr, and the fountains, that at the start ha tossed with wine, poured forth bub-bli tears and foaming blood, and on the rigt side of the road there was a serpent, an the man said to the bad angel, "What is nat serpent?" and the answer was, "That is the serpent of stinging remorse." On the left side the road there was a lion, and the man asked the bad angel, "What is that lion?" and the answer was, "That is the lion of all-devouring despair." A vulture flew through the sky, and the man asked the bad angel, "What is that vulture?" and the answer was, "That is the vulture waiting for the carcasses of the slain." And then the man began to try to pull off him the folds of something that had wound him round and round, and he said to the bad angel, "What is it that twists me in this awful convolution?" and the answer was, "That is the worm that never dies." And then the man said to the bad angel, "What does all this mean? I trusted in what you said at the corner of Broadway and Houston street; I trusted it all, and why have you thus deceived me?" Then the last deception fell off the charmer, and it said, "I was sent forth from the pit to destroy your soul; I watched my chance for many a long year; when you hesitated that night on Broadway I gained my triumph; now you are here. Ha! ha! You are here. Come, now, let us fill these two chalices of fire, and drink together to darkness and woe and death. Hail! Hail!" Oh! young man, will the good angel sent forth by Christ, or the bad angel sent forth by sin, get the victory over your soul? Their wings are interlocked this moment above you, contending for your destiny, as above the Apennines, eagle and condor fight mid-sky. This hour may decide your destiny.

KING KOKO OF THE BRASSMEN, IN HIS WAR CANOE ON THE NIGER.

WON BY A VERSE.

Dr. Valpy, the author of a great many class books, wrote the following simple lines as his confession of faith:

In peace let me resign my breath
And thy salvation see;
My sins deserve eternal death,
But Jesus died for me.

Valpy gave those lines to Dr. March, a rector, who put them over his study mantel-shelf. The Earl of Roden read them.

"Will you give me a copy of these lines?" said the good Earl.

"I shall be glad," said Dr. March.

Lord Roden took them home and put them over his mantel-shelf. General Taylor, a Waterloo hero, came into the room, and noticed them. He read them over and over again, while staying with Lord Roden, till his lordship remarked: "I say, friend Taylor, I should think you knew those lines by heart."

General Taylor handed those lines to an officer in the army, who was going out to the Crimean war. He came home to die; and when Dr. March went to see him, the poor soul in his weakness, said: "Good sir, do you know this verse which General Taylor gave to me? It brought me to my Saviour, and I die in peace."

ceded it,—all brought about by traders, quarrels and the prevalent use of rum and gin—has made missionary work in that part of Africa exceedingly difficult and full of the gravest perils. But the consecrated laborers under the Yoruba Mission count their own safety and even their lives as of little moment in comparison with the importance of the Gospel work they have undertaken.

The Lagos Mission was established in 1852, and in addition to six churches at Lagos, it has now a pastorate organization comprising four parishes. Bishop Crowther's first experience in this field is a record of Divine protection guarding and prospering a wonderful work. His steamer was wrecked four hundred miles from her destination, and Crowther was detained eighteen months on the Upper Niger and finally succeeded in reaching Lagos overland through the Yoruba country. One of his first stations—Gbebe on the Niger—was demolished by a civil war and his converts were scattered. He was seized by a hostile chief and held for a ransom, and Mr. Fell, a British agent, while effecting Crowther's release, was himself slain by a poisoned arrow. Soon after, Crowther was consecrated Bishop of the Niger and he then began the work of establishing a chain of missions in the Niger delta, Brass being occupied by the Christian missionaries in 1868, Bonny having been opened to the work by the invitation of its king, two years earlier. Great progress was made during the next few years; cannibalism and human sacrifices were almost unknown, fetish worship was dying out and Christian teachers took the place of native "devil doctors." From 1872 to 1878 was a period of violent persecution and several converts yielded up their lives for the truth; but in the latter year a new revival began, since which time the Gospel has made progress uninterruptedly.

In 1892, Rev. Joseph Sidney Hill was appointed to the see vacated by the death of Bishop Crowther, and two native African clergymen—Revs. C. Phillips and I. Oluwole—were consecrated as assistant bishops at the same time. Bishop Hill, accompanied by a large party of teachers for Sierra Leone, Yoruba, and the Niger, arrived at Lagos in December, 1893. On January 5, 1894, Bishop Hill died of African fever, after a brief sickness. His faithful wife, who had accompanied him to Africa, succumbed to the same dread disease a few hours after her husband.

Perhaps one of the gloomiest pictures of heathen life ever drawn was that given by Bishop Hill in an address while in London, shortly before his return to Africa. He said: "Infanticide and cannibalism prevail there to an appalling extent. One day we went out in the evening, and were engaged cutting down some of the bushes. As we walked along we came across a native earthenware pot. Out of curiosity I broke it open. A lady who was with us turned away, and when I looked, I found that it contained the remains of a little child. Presently we found another, and then a great number, and in every one we found the dead body of a little child, who had been put to death as soon as it was born. There were 120 in that little bush alone. That is infanticide.

"At the town of Aboshi, some 500 children are put to death in one year. You can cross the river here, and presently you see a man coming along wearing a very peculiar hat some twelve inches high. This hat is the most remarkable part of his clothing, there being little else besides. His eye is painted white, and he has also many other curious marks about his body. A little boy marches in front of him ringing a bell. You salute the gentleman. You ask who he is, and find he is a king; you consequently salute him again. Then you come across another, and find he is a king; and in the space of a few minutes you meet six or so more—all kings—and you begin to wonder how many kings there are in the place. You are told some 400 in all. Before that man can wear that hat, he is obliged to provide two human sacrifices for the sins of the town, and this is all done in the name of religion.

"Out there they make human sacrifices to the town gods, though this has largely been put a stop to now, not by missionary societies merely, but by trading companies. The Royal Niger Trading Company has done a vast amount of good by striving to put a stop to human sacrifices and to the gin traffic. A girl in Bonny, who was to be offered as a sacrifice, had tied about her body thirty-six different things, mostly fowls, which were to be offered with her. At this place (Bonny) there is a large temple with 5000 human skulls, representing 5000 men and women that have been eaten at cannibal feasts."

On January 17, 1894, the General Committee nominated Rev. Herbert Tugwell, the Secretary of the Yoruba Mission, as the late Bishop Hill's successor. Bishop Tugwell is a graduate of Cambridge, England, and was ordained in 1880 to the curacy of Petworth, in Sussex. He is a son of the late Rev. F. Tugwell, of Essex, England. He joined the Yoruba Mission, in West Africa, in 1850, and in the same year went out to the field as Secretary of the Mission. The late Bishop Crowther was with the out-going party. He had seen four years' work in Africa when he was chosen to succeed Bishop Hill, and was recalled from Africa to be consecrated in Lambeth Place Chapel. Under his vigorous administration the Mission has already made marked spiritual progress.

New mission stations have been opened further up the river, but the growth of trade and the increase in population have brought increased difficulties in the work. Besides these, the missionaries have been compelled to combat the demoralizing influence of the liquor traffic, which has lowered the moral tone of all the settlements and stations. Still, in spite of all obstacles, the white and native teachers work lovingly and hopefully side by side, and every year marks another stage of substantial progress in the direction of the goal of all their hopes—the winning of heathen Africa for Christ.

LEANING ON JESUS.

JESUS, when the billows roll,
Threatening to engulf my soul,
Tempest-tossed, I turn to thee;
Shield, protect, and comfort me.
Let me see thy smiling face,
Hold me in a close embrace.

When the waves with wild uproar,
Dash against the fretted shore;
Then my spirit yearns for rest,
On thy tender, loving breast.
Jesus, Saviour, Brother, Friend,
Give me victory to the end.

When the rugged path and steep,
Leads too near the surging deep;
Place my feet in wisdom's way,
Let them never—never stray.
Make thou this poor heart of mine,
Clean and pure, and true as thine.

When this transient life is o'er,
And I reach the heavenly shore,
Meet my loved ones, heart to heart,
Meet them, never more to part;
My triumphant song shall be,
Jesus loved and cared for me.

THE AGONY IN GETHSEMANE.

S. S. Lesson for May 5. Mark 14: 32-42. Golden Text John 18: 11. By Mrs. Baxter

THE last supper was over. Jesus and his disciples had left the "upper room, and were on their way to the Mount of Olives. Jesus had announced to the "little flock" of his disciples: "All ye shall be offended [caused to stumble] in me this night, for it is written, "I will smite the Shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad." (Mark 14: 31, R.V.) He knew, from the Old Testament Scriptures, that which was coming upon him. (Zech. 13: 7.) And once more, to their unopened spiritual understanding he spoke of his resurrection: "After I am raised up I will go before you into Galilee." (R.V.) And he had patience to bear with their unanimous and Peter's vehement repudiation of such an implication: "Though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee." He knew, as they did not, all that was at hand, and he could wait his Father's time for their understanding to be opened. And now the storm which was brewing began to break upon him. "They come to a place which was named Gethsemane, and he saith unto his disciples, Sit ye here while I pray. (Ver. 32, R.V.) And he taketh with him Peter, and James, and John, and began to be greatly amazed and sore troubled. And he saith unto them: My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death, abide ye here and watch." Could it be that had taken hold on him who had again and again announced his coming sufferings and death to his disciples? Had he not steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem (Luke 9: 51), "knowing all things that should come upon him;" how then should he shrink from death at this hour? There was another element in the question: he knew from Scripture that he was indeed "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world," and the Lamb slain (in God's purpose) from the foundation of the world. (Rev. 13: 8.) He had already spoken of his coming death in these terms: "Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it up again. This commandment have I received of my Father." (John 10: 17, 18.) He had seen in Scripture that he was to be the voluntary Sin Offering, and all his will responded. Terrible as was death, the punishment and consequence of sin, to him who was the all holy One, he had faced the matter and counted the cost, and had set his face like a flint, and knew that he should not be ashamed. (Isa. 4: 7.)

And now there stood before him death in another aspect. The awful load of a world's sin was coming upon him—"made sin for us" (II. Cor. 5: 21); made a "curse for sin" (Gal. 3: 13)—was beginning so to tell upon his physical frame that it was giving way, and death from sheer exhaustion, without redeeming a lost world seemed imminent. Up to this moment his confidence in his Father had never forsaken him.

"He Trusted in God"

(Matt. 27: 43), was true of him before the chief priests, with the scribes and elders mocked him with it. (Matt. 27: 43.) For a moment, a terrible moment, he seems to have been uncertain about his Father's will. It was a masterpiece of temptation from the enemy. If he were to die in Gethsemane he could not offer his life a ransom for many: in an intense degree, beyond what any child of man has experienced, it seemed as though God's Word and his providences were contradictory. Up till now, he had walked in the full light of his Father's countenance; he saw now everything for the world's redemption depended on the issue of this tremendous question; he had seen the Cross in the written Word; but perhaps he had not so clearly seen Gethsemane.

"He went forward a little," no more accompanied by even the chosen three: no man could follow him then into the intense conflict which he was entering upon. "And he prayed that if it were possible the hour might pass from him. And he said, Abba Father, all things are possible unto thee; remove this cup from me; howbeit, not what I will, but what thou wilt." The known will of his Father had been his meat, he must come now to trust the unknown will of his Father. He yielded even if the world's redemption for which he had become incarnate should be lost! "And being in agony, he prayed more earnestly: and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down upon the ground." (Luke 22: 44). His Father did not leave him alone: "There appeared unto him an angel from heaven strengthening him" (ver. 43). And he was heard. "In the days of his flesh, having offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death, and for his godly fear, though he was a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered." (Heb. 5: 7, 8, R.V.) It was perhaps his first prayer in the dark, the first moment in his life of humiliation and self-renunciation when there was a shadow of doubt as to his Father's will. But he was heard, he was saved from death in Gethsemane that he might fulfil his mission, and bear our sins in his own body on the tree. (I.Pet. 2: 24, R.V., margin). But who can estimate the awful tension of that hour, or the strength of the enemy's temptation to him, that if he died in Gethsemane all would be lost, and his incarnation be a failure? Jesus had graduated in the school of obedience yet this supreme test of obedience is spoken of as though it were the learning of obedience to him, as though all other lists of obedience which he had passed through were not to be compared with this one.

He saw that he was not mistaken, that the light of the Word: "It is written" had not deceived him, and that circumstances might change so that life could be restored to him when he was actually dying; but that God's Word could not fail. Let us learn this deep lesson of obedience to God and to his Word, when even possibility seems to forbid and close the way. God cannot make a mistake, and he who made a way through the sea, and through the Jordan for his people, and through Gethsemane for his Son, will always make obedience to his word possible to us, although all our powers may fail and circumstances may forbid. If we "follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth" (Rev. 14: 4), we, too, shall have our Gethsemanes, but if we trust in our God, we, too, shall be heard, and a way will be made for us. We may always plead, even should it be in an agony—for the fulfilment of his written word and the completion of his purposes.

When Satan can do nothing else, he will seek to destroy our physical power. As long as he can get a footing in our self-life, and create a strife between our will and the will of God, it is to his interest to let us live, as illustrations of the failure of Christ's teaching and example. When, however, he finds that these temptations meet with a spirit and a will truly crucified with Christ, he changes his tactics, and does his best to destroy the body, and get rid of those whose life and spirit proclaim the irresistible powers of the life of Christ. Do not let us be surprised if those who are really serving the living and the true God and waiting for his Son from heaven, experience conflicts with powers of death increasingly as the Master's coming draws near. All praise be to him, he has made a way through Gethsemane, as surely as the way was made through the Red Sea of old, and through death itself on Calvary. "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man, even if no other than the Son of man has passed through it, but "God is faithful who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able to bear, but will with the temptation, make a way to escape that ye may be able to bear it." (I.Cor. 10: 13.)

While the Master was waging this tremendous warfare alone, although it was for a world, his disciples, even the chosen three, were sleeping! Even the vehement Peter, in spite of all his assurance of his own fidelity was asleep.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

IN THE GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE.

INTO the scene of this week's lesson we enter with deep reverence and solemn awe. It is a scene of mysterious suffering, incomprehensible to mortal man. We can but dimly guess at its cause and its nature, we see only that it was excruciating and had elements in it that Christ felt acutely. It appears to have been about midnight when the supper in the upper room was finished, and the last hymn sung. Then with his eleven followers, Jesus went down into the street and out through the city gate to the valley of the Kedron. Crossing the brook and ascending the familiar slope of Olivet, they came almost at its foot, and about a mile from the city wall, to the Garden of Gethsemane. There is a garden there yet, probably at or near the same spot. It is a walled enclosure, about fifty yards square, in which eight venerable olive trees still rear their heads. Doubtless they grow out of the roots of the very trees under whose shadow, in the light of the full moon, Jesus walked that night. Those trees were levelled, with all the other trees of the valley, in the great siege, but these give the garden much the same aspect as it had then. The place was evidently one of Christ's familiar haunts, for Judas seeking him, an hour or so later, and finding the upper room vacant where he had left the party, knew where he was likely to be. Jesus was in the habit of spending his nights in solitary places in prayer, but this was to be a night unlike any other before or since. He went forward into the recesses of the garden, taking with him his three most intimate disciples and leaving the others at the entrance to the garden. Peter, James, and John had been with him on the Mount of Transfiguration, and had seen his glory; now they were to see him in his bitterest humiliation. As on that other occasion, they were sleepy, and their indifference seems to have added to Christ's sorrow. He confided to them that his soul was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death, and he craved their human sympathy and companionship. Mark says, doubtless receiving the information from Peter, that Jesus "was greatly amazed and sore troubled." The expression is very significant. It implies that Jesus saw or felt something appalling, something that terrified him. That it was his approaching death is unlikely. The dread of mere physical pain was not sufficient to account for suffering such as he endured in the garden. He prayed that the hour might pass from him, and "being in agony," as Luke says, "he prayed more earnestly." There must have been in his nature, and in the position he occupied, elements of anguish beyond our conception. It was mental and spiritual torture of the most poignant kind. Three times he prayed, and Luke says his sweat was as great drops of blood. But he came victorious out of this ordeal, as he came out of the struggle of the wilderness. Then the betrayer came he was master of himself, and he went in unruffled majesty to the physical suffering of the cross.

What thou wilt. Even in his agony Christ desired that his Father's will of his own should be done. A bright example of this spirit was given by one of the early missionaries of the Livingstone Congo Mission. He was very enthusiastic as he went out with great hopes of doing good work for Christ. But he was struck down by fever at the outset and there were no hopes of his recovery. One of his fellow missionaries, who knew him well, went to see him. Expecting that he would be grievously cast down and disappointed at having to abandon the work he had hoped to do, his visitor went to sympathize with him. But the dying young missionary needed no sympathy. He said: "I give myself, body, mind, and soul to the Lord. I consecrated my whole life and being to his service. And now, if it pleases him to use myself, instead of the work which I proposed to do for him, what is that to me? It is his will that I wish done. It is for him to decide whether he will have me here or away. I am his to do with me as he please, and I am quite content to die or live."

Leonie's Album Quilt.

I WAS paying a visit in a remote country village; remote I mean from the railroad, which was nearly thirty miles distant from the parish where Leonie's husband lived the life of a hard working physician. On foot, or in conveyances, or mounted on horseback, people went from place to place in that primitive region, and life was much simpler there than in the great cities. Somehow people have fewer wants, and those they had were easily gratified, and the social rallying-point very naturally was the church. Never having been in precisely such a community, everything was new and entertaining to me, and the very thing my hostess feared, that I would miss accustomed luxuries, made the experience more delightful than it otherwise would have been.

In my very comfortable, but plainly furnished chamber, there was one article which afforded me never-failing enjoyment. It was what is called an album quilt. In this sort of a quilt, composed of many pieces of patchwork sewed together, there is in the centre of every patch a little oblong bit of white, on which a name and date, and sometimes a sentiment or text are written in indelible ink.

"Leonie," I said, one day, "that is a curious quilt of yours; how did you come by it?"

"Well," she replied, "that quilt has a history. It does not really belong to me: it was presented to Dr. Leale by a set of friends of his among the mountains, and it has a story attached."

"I knew it," I said, clapping my hands. "Now tell me the story."

"Soon after our marriage," said Leonie, "Dr. Leale was sent for one spring morning to attend a patient in a critical condition upon the Crest, as that hamlet perched among the hills above us, is called. I hated to have him go, for there had been heavy rain, and the streams were rising. The river there," pointing to a turbid and dark flowing sheet not far away, "was foaming and angry, and I, a city girl, and a stranger, shivered at the thought of the danger before my dear husband. It was useless to remonstrate, for when Doctor sees duty before him, he sets his face like a flint, and the iron will of his brooks no opposition."

"'Good-bye, Leonie, my wife, my darling,' he said, straining me to his breast in a passionate embrace, 'Good-bye. God is with us both. I hope to be back to-morrow, but if I am not, keep up a brave heart, and trust the Lord, whose orders I am carrying out.'

"Margerie," she added, "this solemn parting was not of a kind to keep up my spirits, and you may imagine what I went through in the ten days that elapsed before my good man came back. He reached the Crest, performed the operation he went to effect through, and then simply had to stay there, a prisoner, till the floods abated. Providentially for him, there was a good deal of severe illness among the mountaineers at the time, and so my husband was busy, which made it easier for him to bear the waiting and to endure the suspense he knew was my portion.

"After his return, and when everything had settled into ordinary ways, when, indeed, we had ceased to refer everything to the great flood, we were one evening surprised by a visit from our friends of the Crest.

"If you ever meet these good people, you will find them very kind and true-hearted, but wonderfully silent and undemonstrative. They have not much money, and it is not often they combine in a gift or testimonial, and so that is why I prize so highly the album quilt bestowed on Doctor Archie McAlister Leale.

"They presented it," my hostess went on, "in the funniest way. Two wagon-loads came, and several friends on horseback. I flew around to get them supper. We always have plenty of ham and bacon; coffee and biscuits are easily made; I had a good stock of preserves, and a lot of fruit-cake in the pantry, and some of the women helped me, so supper was ready in a twinkling. Doctor looked at me and I at Doctor, for we didn't quite know what to make of it, but we asked the oldest guest to say grace, and he did so, in a beautiful, hearty fashion, and then they ate, and were quite chatty and sociable.

"When supper was over, Uncle Jerry Vine rose and very gravely rapped on the table for order.

"'Doctor Leale and Mrs. Doctor Leale,' he said, 'we friends from the Crest didn't happen in; we came o' purpose, to give you a present, and here it is. It was made for the Doctor, and belongs to the Doctor, but seeing husband and wife are one, I have decided to put it in her hands, and not into his.'"

"It was the album quilt?"

"Yes, the album quilt. The pieces patched by those women from bits of their wedding-gowns, and their babies' dresses, and little scraps saved here and saved there, and in every patch was a name of somebody the Doctor had been good to, or somebody who loved the Doctor, and a favorite text. Come, let's study it out, Margie.'

The little history fresh in my hearing, I looked with a tender respect on those carefully stitched bits of calico. Here are some of the texts:

"And ye shall be my people, and I will be your God." Alice Ainsworth, 18—.

"By his knowledge the depths are broken up, and the clouds drop down the dew." Mary Anne Watts, 18—.

"Commit thy way into the Lord, and he shall direct thy steps." Martha McGilvary, 18—. "Discretion shall preserve thee." Susan Packard, 18—.

So it went straight through the alphabet. The verses were not always particularly appropriate; they seemed to have been picked out at random, but oh! the good will, the kind gratitude expressed in that quaint way. Leonie said, and I did not wonder, that she should hand the quilt down to her children.

"Before they left, that moonlight night," said Leonie, "our friends from the Crest had family prayers with us. They stood, a reverent-looking band of men and women, and sang in clear, strong tones that beautiful hymn, 'How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord, is laid for your faith in his excellent Word.' Then, Uncle Jerry prayed, a prayer for the Doctor, for me, for the community, which I never heard surpassed, it was so close, so pleading, so intimate. I have never since been afraid, no matter how lonesome it has been, or how rough the people, or how long or late the good doctor has to stay, when off on his rounds in this new country. I know he is safe and I am safe, for we are compassed round about with prayer."

WOMEN OF ARMENIA.

Instructive, by reason of the singular contrast it presents, is the photograph which appears on this page, and which has been forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mr. Paul Shimmon, a young Persian, now studying in an American college, for a missionary career in the East. It represents the old and the new Armenia—the Moslem bride, veiled, hooded, mysterious; and the Christian, bright, open, frank-faced, and cheerful. These two are types of the two great elements that make up the population of Armenia to-day; elements as diverse as can well be imagined. The recent troubles in that country, which are now under investigation by a Commission, demonstrate the hopelessness of any attempt to reconcile Mohammedanism and Christianity, in any part of the world where the Moslem has a firm foothold.

WOMEN OF ARMENIA.

A CHRISTIAN BRIDE. A MOSLEM WIFE.

Armenia is a mountainous country of Western Asia, and it is generally supposed by Bible commentators and reviewers, that the Garden of Eden was located somewhere among its lovely valleys, where can be found the most entrancing scenery and one of the most perfect climates in the world. On one of its highest mountains—the peak of Ararat—Noah's Ark rested, after its long and divinely-guided voyage. Its people are among the oldest civilized nation in the world, and were among the earliest Christian converts. Although now a comparatively small nation in point of numbers, its influence is felt in commerce throughout the world. In morals, intellectual culture and general abilities its people compare well with other Eastern nations, although they have been dispirited by long oppression. Armenia has had the Bible for nearly fifteen hundred years. Her long struggle for political and religious freedom is still apparently far from ended; but her sons and daughters look hopefully forward to the time when their native land will once more take its place among the great nations of the world.

A Christian Countess.

Her Labors for the "Lost" in Germany and the Persecutions she Underwent.

FEW women who have devoted their lives to Christian work, have had as remarkable an experience as Countess Adeline Schimmelman, whose labors among the fallen have been widely discussed in recent Danish and German publications. She is the daughter of the late Lehnsgrave Schimmelman, a Danish nobleman, who owned large estates in Germany and America. When about twenty years of age, she became a great favorite of the late Emperor William and was the principal lady of honor to Empress Augusta. Even as a young girl, she had strong religious convictions and she secured the Empress's influence to allow her to visit the prisons, where she encountered many who were in a deplorable spiritual condition. Eventually she herself found Christ while engaged in these self-sacrificing labors and from that time until the present, she has labored zealously and indefatigably to win souls for the Master.

COUNTESS ADELINE SCHIMMELMAN.

Her self-imposed work has led her among all classes. She has ministered spiritually and otherwise to thousands of inmates in different jails and penitentiaries, to the fishermen of the Baltic provinces, the dwellers in the lowliest parts of the great German cities and in hundreds of villages. Regarding the prevalence of intemperance as a great source of evil, she became a rival of the tavern-keepers by providing coffee and lemonade free for the poor workmen and tried in many ways to point them to the Saviour of souls. Her influence deepened and widened especially in the island of Rugen, and there her stay was extended into years. With her own moderate portion of her father's fortune, she created facilities for mission work. She built a seamen's home, with day and sleeping rooms, adding stables, etc., for visitors' horses. The praise of God took the place of the profane word, till no improper utterance ever reached her ears. The work spread till, in a few years, over thirty villages round, became permeated with her reforming influence. The provincial authorities heard of it, and came to see and to wonder. She lived a life of frugality and self-denial, and gave all her time and means to the work.

Meanwhile, the story of her doings came to the ears of her relatives at the Prussian Court and in some circles she was regarded as hopelessly mad. They could neither comprehend her work nor appreciate her sacred motive and said of her as Festus did of Paul: "Thou art beside thyself." A relative procured her arrest and incarceration on the plea that she was insane, and she was duly committed to an asylum, while her property was taken charge of by her relations.

A few weeks, however, convinced the asylum authorities of her entire sanity and she was released and at once arranged to return to her former field of labor. Her means have been lessened, and her strength overstrained by her terrible trials, but she feels that a work of such importance will yet be blessed of God in greater measure even than before.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

THE stranger passes along our streets, and he sees the front steps, the doorway, the windows of a thousand houses, and they seem very much alike. Brick is brick, and iron is iron, and brown stone is brown stone; but the wall between those houses is the boundary of a republic. God has fenced it off from all the world. It is a realm by itself. It is the most sacred spot on earth to us. There our children were born. There our loved ones died. Festivities and lamentations, reunions and partings have dedicated the place. Father and mother, son and daughter call it home. Nothing will so soon kindle a man into a conflagration of wrath, or hurl him into such a thunderbolt of indignation as the invasion of that home. When his work is done, he expects to die there. The last time he ever sees the world he will see it from that window.

Now, in these places are concentered more of happiness than can be found in any other place. God has kindly apportioned us into families, and let us be grateful for the gracious grouping. It could not have merely happened so. It was Divinely ordered that it should be so. Upon all our homes may the blessing come! Upon the dining-room, and may there be bread enough and to spare! Upon the nursery, and let sickness stand back! Upon your pillow, and you be guarded by him who never slumbereth or sleepeth! Upon your parlor, that it may be the scene of healthful reunion and neighborhood civilities! Upon your library, that the destroying angel of iniquitous literature never touch its wing to the shelf or table! And may there be a frequent spot of prayer—a family altar—where all shall kneel, and all shall get Divine blessing! And then, when a few more seasons have come and gone, and that home is broken up, as it must be by the passing of years, may our sons and daughters in other homes live happy and useful lives; and we who are now in the generation at the front have passed into a better home,—a home with God—"The house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." But we shall leave the gate open as we go through, and after awhile the rest of our circle will come and join us in the land where nothing can disrupt or destroy.

OUR VICTORY.

THIS world is going to be saved, and you and I are going to have a share in the work, and a share in the triumph. When a war ends in success, the general gets a loud acclaim, but do not all the regiments, clear down to the drummer-boy, feel the gladness? So when this Gospel campaign ends in the subjugation of all sin and the establishment of all righteousness, Christ, the Commander-in-Chief of all the forces of earth and heaven, shall get the glory, but you and I who have marched in the ranks and loaded humblest carbine in the battle, will be permitted to cheer in the grand ovation to the Conqueror on the white horse: "And he hath on his vesture, and on his thigh, a name written: King of kings, and Lord of lords."

NEWSPAPERS.

THE price of the daily newspapers dropped from five cents to four cents, and from three to two, and in some cases down to one cent. If newspapers continued to lower their prices in the same ratio for any length of time, we would soon get our paper for nothing, or have the paper free of charge and bonus handed us for the kindness of taking it. I find no cause for congratulation for this newspaper depreciation of prices. It has for years been to me occasion for surprise that intelligence could be furnished for us at rates of such fabulous cheapness. The expenses of publication are so great that three-quarters of the papers that start, soon end in bankruptcy. The whole tendency of this extreme depreciation of prices is to make a newspaper less vigorous and attractive. To meet the reduction, the fabric of paper will soon be poorer; editorial and reportorial salaries will after awhile be lowered to meet the case; and hence the intellectual work will be more hurried and less accurate. One pen will be called to do the work of two pens; one proof-reader the work of two proof-readers; one compositor the work of two compositors; and newsboys and dealers will make less percentage. A most important revolution is now going on in newspaperdom. Some wonder; others rejoice; some hope for still further descent of prices. With nothing at stake but our interest in the public good, we think the tendency disastrous. Vast sums of money will be expended to keep up prosperous appearance. Immense lying will go on in regard to circulation; and only after great losses will this literary market come back to healthful and common-sense basis. But one good can come of such a state of things, and that is the awakening of the public mind to appreciation of the enormous expense through which the daily newspaper brings intelligence to our doors. The occurrences of the hemispheres for twenty-four hours handed us for three, or two, or one cent. When these facts shall be developed, instead of wondering that our information costs us so much, we will be thrown into amazement that it costs us so little.

DROP THAT AXE.

THE prince of the power of the air" has held another carnival. Tornadoes and cyclones have been at work. Many lives lost, and property destroyed by the millions of dollars' worth. These archangels of hurricane will continue until we cease cutting down the forests which God raised to stop the flight of cyclones. Forests are natural bulwarks, and the slaughter of them is an invitation to tornadoes. The discovery of coal mines reaching from end to end of this continent, is a suggestion from God to let the forests alone, and seek fuel from under the hills, instead of from the top of them. Legislatures need to pass laws prohibiting "the axe against the thick trees." Each man with such fell design needs to have sung in his ear George P. Morris's hymn, "Woodman, Spare that Tree." The only time I saw George P. Morris, the author of that song, was one day along the Hudson, when seated on his horse, he turned around in his saddle and described to me the scene he witnessed on the occasion of his first hearing that song sung. It was in some academy of music, and the vocalist had rendered it with so much effect that an excited and venerable-looking man rose in the audience, and said to the singer, "I would like to ask if the woodman really did spare the tree?" There is a higher estimate to be put upon trees of America than the wood-cutter sets when he sells them for so much a cord. They are the preservation of the lives and wealth of the nation. The trees are going down in such quick and wide ruin that it is high time the attention of legislators is called to the iconoclasm.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

K. Morris, Germantown, Pa. What was the name of the Queen of Sheba who visited Solomon?

Ethiopians, who claimed that she came from their country, called her "Candace," which may have been either a proper name or a distinctive title. Pliny states that she was the Queen of Meroe in Ethiopia. Another authority calls her Nicaule, and still another Lacasa.

The following additional names have been received as members of the Corresponding Circle for spiritual improvement, suggested by "Reader," Ont., Can.:

Lizzie H. Sawyer, Mentor, O.; R. M. Cox, Purcell, Indian Ter.; Mrs. Olivia North, West Millbrook, Mich.; Izra M. Cole, Redwood Falls, Minn.; Donald Miller, Box 207, Lyme, Conn.; L. D. Parker, Box 906, West Bay City, Mich.; W. A. Ross, Box 72, Montague City, Mass.; Susie Schermerhorn, Buchanan, Mich.; Mrs. Sara Love, Parmelee, Mich.; Harry F. Hamer, Bart, Pa.

A number of letters have been received in reply to the inquiry of "M. S.," in THE MAIL-BAG of April 3, how a housekeeper should arrange her duties so as to best observe Sunday. Mrs N. J. Wheeler, Ann Arbor, Mich., writes of the arrangements in her own home:

All needed preparations of Sunday meals are done on Saturday. Such dishes only used as are warmed by steaming or in hot ovens. Sweeping, dusting stoves all done. Evening bath and change of clothes on Saturday; soiled clothes put in their place; Sunday clothes in readiness for the morning. I had three miles to ride to morning service; dinner at 1; then one mile to 2.30 p.m. service; luncheon at 6, and then evening service. I had a family of ten to eighteen; am now in my seventieth year.

Mrs. H. W. Howe, Hubbardston, Mass., writes:

The commandment says, "Thou shalt not do any work," but there are many passages that are not to be taken literally. We must use reason and common-sense in connection with Scriptures. I think the Saviour taught that we are to perform works of mercy and necessity on the Sabbath. (Matt. 12: 1-13.) I do not understand that we have any permission in God's Word to do any unnecessary work; or anything that can be done on Saturday.

Clare, Drennen, Pa., writes:

I do not think we would be violating the fourth commandment by doing such things as you mention—for example, washing dishes. No good housekeeper will leave her dishes to the mercy of the flies. Cleanliness is next to godliness. And as for making beds on the Sabbath, I think no tidy housekeeper will permit such duties to be left undone. I consider such duties works of necessity. Yet how many there are who work on the Sabbath day! I am much opposed to having an elaborate meal served on Sunday. We should eat less for we are not supposed to work. It is a day set apart for rest. Neither should servants be made to work on Sunday. I would suggest preparing Sunday's dinner on Saturday so far as one is able.

Mrs. C. C. Robinson, Wilton, N. J., writes:

We must have a desire and a will to keep it, then it will be much easier. When I was a child, which was many years ago (being a descendant of the Pilgrim fathers), we children did not know that there could be such a thing as play on the Sunday. An uncle of mine, a farmer, used always to leave his work at 3 o'clock p. m. on Saturday; go in and shave, and spend the remainder of the day in preparation for Sunday. He did not allow the women folk to sweep or wash dishes or do any work that could possibly be avoided; they would have to wash dishes before breakfast on Monday morning. If a housekeeper has a true desire to glorify God and will ask God's help, she will be blest in so doing.

A. Keeler, Prescott, Ari., writes:

I think if "M. S." would just drop the word Sabbath, and substitute Lord's Day instead, all would be clear. If it was a case of Sabbath-keeping, and one was found even picking up sticks, they were to be stoned to death. Num. 15: 32-36. Now, knowing it is not the Sabbath, but the Lord's Day, we ought to avoid all unnecessary work and make it (not a day of feasting, as many do), but a day of service to our blessed Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

Mrs. C. H. Spurr, Melrose, Mass., writes:

I have a family of six, youngest five years. On Saturday everything is done that is possible in housework and preparing for Sunday's meals, such as cooking meats and making desserts. Clean bedding is put on the beds and on Sunday it takes a very few moments to spread up the beds, which are aired immediately on rising. I have the children help by clearing the table, brushing up the floor under the dining table, and such things. We all go to church and generally have a little more elaborate dinner than usual.

Wm. H. Hayden, Springfield, Ills., writes:

In Ex. 35: 3 we read, "Ye shall kindle no fires in your dwellings on the Sabbath day." Does "M. S." violate this, the Lord's own interpretation of the fourth commandment, and has she read of the execution of law Num. 15: 32-36 upon a man preparing to violate the command? If so, Rom. 6 and 7, and the whole epistle to the Galatians should be carefully studied, and then let Col. 2: 14-17 have consideration. Bondage under law is contrary to the liberty of the believer. We are not striving to obey law but are guided by New Testament precept, and strive to walk in the footsteps of our great Exemplar.

X. Y. Z., Saxonville, Mass. Please tell me what you think of the enclosed letter received a short time ago. The writer we never saw or heard of before and greatly doubt her truthfulness. Not only the story but also the way of obtaining the money is very unsatisfactory to us. If it is all true, the idea of attempting to get money in such a way is one to be warned against.

The letter which X. Y. Z., encloses is a "chain letter" of the kind now largely used by professional letter-writing beggars. It is unfortunately true that the "chain" has developed into a nuisance and its use would make even a genuinely deserving case appear exceedingly doubtful. The writer of the "chain letter" has no authority for naming THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as though it approved of her effort. As a matter of fact, we consign all "chain letters" to the waste-basket.

T. M. Leffingwell, Dubuque, Ia. How long has Athos been occupied as a Christian hermitage?

Mount Athos, a peninsula in Turkey, has been an exclusive retreat for hermits and monks for over a thousand years. There are many churches on the peninsula, and probably three thousand inhabitants, all men. No women are allowed to come there.

B., Harpersville, N. Y. Can a true Christian conscientiously remain a member of a lodge or society, two-thirds of whose members are even professors of religion, while half of them are Sabbath-breakers?

We should imagine such society would be distasteful to him, and that he would leave it unless, indeed, he can serve the cause of religion by remaining and trying to influence the members to better lives.

James Banat, Kewanee, Ill. What were the husks that "the swine did eat," in the Bible story of "the Prodigal Son?"

The "husks" referred to were probably the beans of the Syrian carob tree, of the locust family, sweetish in taste, which in both ancient and modern times have been a food for horses, cattle and swine. Various reliable writers have declared that at times the carob beans have been used as human food. They are sometimes called "St. John's Bread" from the fact that the Baptist fed upon them in the wilderness.

Rev. Orville J. Nave, Chaplain U. S. Post, Fort Niobrara, Neb., writes:

Through the sympathy and aid of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, its readers keep me generously supplied with religious papers for distribution in the barracks and other places occupied by soldiers in this post. Every mail brings me a few. I get these papers to them early Sunday mornings, so as to provide religious reading matter for the Sabbath for those who desire it. I greatly need books for a library. The additions to our ridiculously small library for a post of over 400 soldiers have been made since a gift of Mr. Bradley, one of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD patrons, three years ago.

Jos. Bennett, No. Morenci, Mich. Is it cold in Palestine in winter?

Never intensely so. The country is sub-tropical, and there is a wide climatic difference between the plains and the upland ranges. At Jerusalem, where the average temperature is sixty-two degrees, the extremes are considerable and the thermometer may sink several degrees below the freezing point, although frost and snow never last long. On the elevated plateau beyond the Jordan, the thermometer frequently falls from eighty degrees in the day-time to below freezing at night. The snow sometimes lies long on the Lebanon range.

Constant Reader, Winterpock, Va. Should a young man desiring to enter the ministry apply for a license to preach either by himself or through a friend or may he begin to preach without license?

If he desires to enter the regular ministry he should conform to the custom of the denomination to which he belongs. There is nothing to hinder his preaching in pulpits of the Congregational or Baptist churches if he has an invitation to do so from the officers. No license is required there. In the Methodist and the Presbyterian and Protestant Episcopal Churches there are certain forms to be observed the nature of which may be ascertained from any clergyman of those churches.

Friend, New York. If Deuteronomy is regarded as a portion of God's word, is it not a sin to eat pork (see Deut. 14: 8)?

No, it is not a sin. The dietary laws, like the ceremonial laws and the law of circumcision, were not imposed on the Gentiles. Some of the Jewish Christians wished the Gentile converts to be brought under the law, but the council of the Apostles forbade it (see Acts 15: 19-29). The peculiar circumstances of the Hebrew nation, their surroundings, the climate and other considerations, were the basis of many prohibitions which have lost their force in these days. Christ laid down the principle of the new dispensation as to these matters very explicitly. (See Matt. 15: 16-20.)

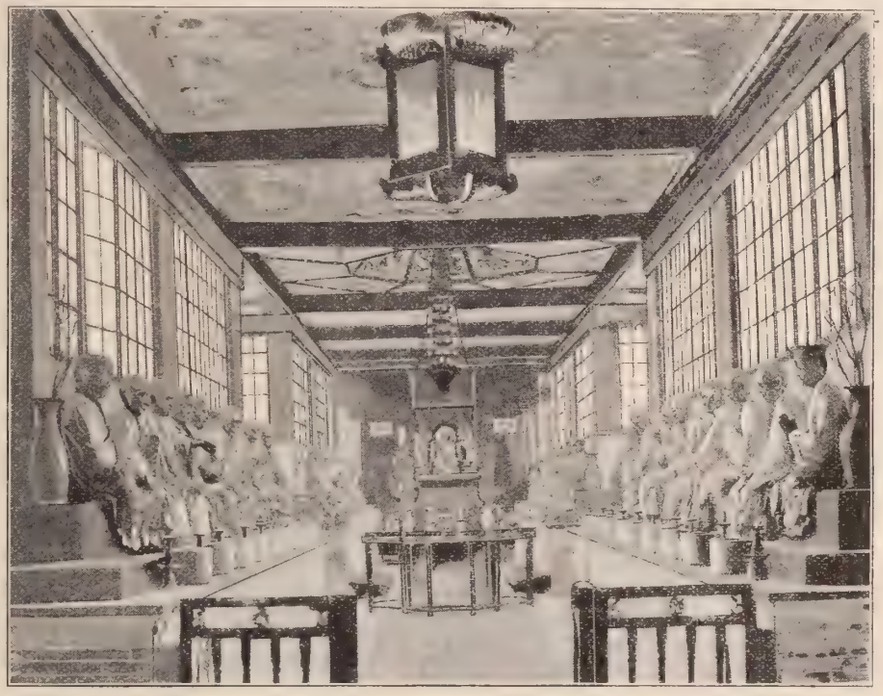
THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

CANTON'S PANTHEON.

ONE of the most extraordinary spectacles in China is the great temple of five hundred idols in Canton, a pictures of which appears on this page. Canton is a city with as large a population as New York. has an enormous trade and its streets are owded with busy merchants, officials and borers. That such men should, in this y, be devout worshippers of the horrible jects collected in the great temple, is an most incredible thing. Yet the visitor ay see at almost any hour of the day and all days, men of prominence in society d business prostrate before one or other these sham divinities. The images be- g to the three religions of China, Tao- n, Confucianism and Buddhism, but ere is no order in their arrangement and ere appears to be no degree of supremacy their station. Even Laotze, the chief di- nity of the Taoists, has no greater honor own to his image than is shown the images of Confucius and ddha. Beside these there are gods war, of all varieties of business, learning, of fire, of the tides, of e planets, of the household and of ealth. Then there are the spirits the deceased emperors duly deified d imaged. In addition, there are ages representing the snake, the t, the rat, the hedgehog, the fox, e weasel and other creatures sup- sed to exercise an influence on hu- n affairs. All these to the num- r of five hundred are represented the great temple of Canton and re are many more, including each n's dead ancestors, who are not resented there, whom the China- n worships in his home or his ce of business. Sacrifices are of- ed to them, and great care is ta- n to propitiate them. No evil ppens to a man that is not attrib- ed to the vegeance of some deity at he has neglected and who is nishing him for his negligence. eir gods are indeed jealous gods the opinion of the worshippers d not a few are described as pos- ssing a malevolence which we as- be only to the devil. But those ver lack worshippers, who are peful that the evil they delight to may fall on some one else, who es not worship them. Thus re- ion becomes an expensive and on- ous burden in China, as it neces- rily must in a land where in one nple there are five hundred deities wait- g for worship and sacrifice. Such super- tion appears to us despicable as well as cked, but the Chinaman is justified in tertaining as poor an opinion of people in ristian lands, whose lives show that they ve no God at all. (Ex. 20: 3, 4.)



THE TEMPLE OF FIVE HUNDRED IDOLS IN CANTON.

A Historical Relic.

In the catalogue of an auction sale which to take place shortly, the New York Sun" says there is an interesting histori- l document. It is the original deed by hich the Duke of York, afterwards James , conveyed to William Penn the region hich is now the State of Delaware. It is ted August 21, 1682, and bears the Duke's gnature in round school-boy characters. he existence of the document was not own until recently. It had probably been the hands of some collector of curiosities. ow it came into the present owner's pos- ssion is not stated, but he wishes to dis- se of it and has given it to an auctioneer Philadelphia, to be sold with other cur- sities. An effort is to be made in Dela- are to purchase it in behalf of the State, t as the Trustees of the British Museum e anxious to secure the relic, the price it ill bring will probably be considerable. It not unlikely that the precious document ill realize almost as much money as the ate was considered to be worth at the ne the deed was drawn up. Both Penn d the Duke would have been amazed uld they have known what the State and the deed conveying it would be worth in the market at the end of two centuries. The actual value of one and the sentimental value of the other have increased beyond their highest conception. But even that change is small in comparison with the difference that death makes for every man in his standard of value. In the realm beyond the grave men will not regard with the indifference they are apt to do here, the title to the eternal inheritance which is offered to them now as a gift. (Col. 3: 24).

Singing Over Flames.

A dangerous panic was averted in Brooklyn on April 7 by the discretion of a company of the Fire Department. A large congregation was assembled in a church in the Twenty-sixth ward, and the evening service was nearing a close when a fireman saw a thin flame illuminating the basement of the church. It is an old building, but a valuable one, and the fireman knew that if the fire once got headway, it would be impossible to save the edifice. He ran to the truck station and aroused the other members of the company. They entered the basement just as the congregation began singing a hymn. The firemen plied their axes with a will, and cut away two beams before the hymn was finished. The noise they made was drowned by the music, and the congregation had no idea that a dangerous fire was burning beneath their feet. The cutting away of the beams laid the seat of the fire bare, and the firemen used the fire-extinguishers with effect. The flames were put out and the firemen had left the building before the congregation discovered the danger with which they had been menaced. It was well that they did not know, for if they had, there might have been a rush for the doors in which some might have been hurt. The preacher would have been likely to see even people who are deaf to the warning that their souls are in danger, become panic-stricken at hearing that their bodies were in danger. (Luke 12: 4, 5.)

A Peculiar Death Notice.

Among the notices of deaths in the New York papers of April 8, was one of a man whose death resulted from an illness "brought on by feeding cats." The statement led to inquiries which elicited the fact that the deceased was fond of cats, and was in the habit of feeding a number of stray ones who came to his house every morning to get food. One morning about the middle of January the cats came as usual, but the man had no food for them. He did not like to disappoint them, so he went to the fish-market and bought a quantity of fish-heads. In going down the steps to the basement, where he usually fed his feline friends, he dropped some of the heads and, stepping on one, his foot slipped and he fell. He was able to rise and go to his room, but he had hurt his foot, and his sister dressed it for him. After a few days, as it grew worse, he consulted a doctor, who advised him to have the foot amputated. The man was astonished, but the physician assured him that gangrene had set in, and urged him to undergo the operation. The patient, however, refused until the pain became unendurable, and other physicians gave the same advice. He then went to the hospital and announced himself willing to lose the foot. But by that time the affection had spread, and the hospital doctors told him he had waited too long and would have to lose his leg. He would not believe them, and as he was obstinate, the foot only was taken off. In a short time he consented to lose the leg, but again he had delayed too long, and the amputation failed to save his life. It was one of those cases in which prompt and severe measures are necessary, and in which delay is fatal. Such cases sometimes come under the observation of ministers who have to give the warning that it is better to sacrifice a business, or a sinful habit, than lose the soul. Too often the advice seems unnecessarily painful, and it is rejected. (Matt. 18: 8.)

Nearly Starved.

A pitiful case of destitution was discovered in New York a few days ago. In one of the tenement houses in Roosevelt street there are a large number of families, each with only one room for living and sleeping accommodation. They are all miserably poor and have nothing to spare for their neighbors. One family, however, was worse off than the others and at last the people in the adjoining rooms called the attention of the police to their condition. An officer went to investigate and reported that he had never in all his experience, seen such abject poverty. A woman was there with a babe only a few days old and there were three other children. The only bed was a heap of foul-smelling rags, the only seats were some empty soap-boxes, and the rest of the furniture consisted of a rusty stove and some broken dishes. The woman was too exhausted by lack of food to speak, but revived after a meal had been given her. She said that for some time past, the family had subsisted on scraps of food that her husband picked from the garbage barrels and they had been unable to get anything else to eat. It was noticed that she wore six cheap rings, with bright stones in them, and she was asked why she did not sell them in the emergency. It appeared that she set great store by the paltry finery and had preferred to starve rather than part with the rings. They would not have sold for much, but her keeping them showed how precious they were to her. We think her foolish, but she is not alone in her folly. The woman who would not part with her rings to save her life is not so foolish as the person who would not part with an estate to save his soul. (Luke 12: 23.)

BRIEF NOTES.

We are Anxious to Introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD into a large number of homes where it is not yet taken. As our readers who know its value will sympathize with this wish, and can help us in the effort, we make them an extraordinary offer. We will send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from now until Jan. 1, 1896—a period of eight months—for one dollar, to any person not previously a subscriber, and to any subscriber sending us such new name with the dollar, we will send, all express charges paid, any one of our three magnificent premiums, "The Pathway of Life," "From Manger to Throne," or "Gospel Hymns from One to Six Complete." A new name sent merely as a substitute for that of a subscriber whose term is about to expire, will not entitle the sender to the advantages of this offer. This opportunity is good only until May 15, 1895.

Rev. Russell H. Conwell, of Philadelphia, relates the remarkable result of a recent prayer. Some thief had stolen from his desk in his study a number of valuable rings, which had been given in the Sunday offering in response to his appeal for help in supporting the hospital. On the following Sunday he prayed for the thief, that God would touch his heart, as it must be particularly hard to allow him to commit such a theft. The next evening there was a rap on his study-door, but when he opened it there was no one there. He heard the sound of hurrying foot-steps, and hanging to the handle of the door was a loop of string on which the missing rings were strung.

The Fifth Annual International Temperance Congress will be held at Basle, Switzerland, on Aug. 20, 21, and 22.

The "Independent" says: We are given to understand that the movement planned by certain leading Baptists and Stundists in Russia for presenting a petition to the Czar begging freedom of religion and the right to meet together for worship has been abandoned for the present as hopeless.

The Next General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church North will be held in the Third Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, Penn., Thursday, May 16th. The opening sermon will be by the retiring moderator, Dr. Samuel A. Mutchmore, of Philadelphia. Dr. W. L. McEwen has charge of arrangements for entertainment.

At the April meeting of the Board of Managers of the American Bible Society, the Rev. H. Loomis reported from Yokohama that up to February 19, 76,211 separate Gospels and 1,449 New Testaments had been distributed among the soldiers of the Japanese army. The circulation of the Scriptures in China during 1894 by the American Bible Society amounted to 305,715 volumes, a greater number than ever before.

Prof. W. H. Pickering, of Harvard, in a communication to the New York Sun, says: "Notice in one of the astronomical magazines that it has been worked out that for the first time since Christ was crucified Mercury, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn are in the same latitude in the sky. There is nothing of great importance to astronomers in the circumstance, but as a matter of general interest it can be said the same relative positions of these planets will not occur again on the anniversary of Good Friday for about 2000 years."

Rheims will Celebrate Next Year the Fourteenth centenary of the conversion of France to Christianity at that place, where in 496 King Clovis and his army were baptized by Saint Remy.

A Great Awakening Has Taken Place in Trinity Baptist Church, Derby, England, in connection with Mr. Telford's two weeks' mission. Nearly 300 persons have been led to Christ.

The Revival of the Past Winter in Chester, Mass., was, a subscriber writes us, the most spiritual and far-reaching that has been felt there during the past thirty years. The Methodist Church has doubled its membership, and there has been a decided religious movement through the town.

A Meeting for Jews was Held at the Bowery Mission, New York on April 14, by Rev. Hermann B. Faust. Although no announcement of the meeting was made, except by a card in the window of the mission, about fifty Jews were present, and at the close of Mr. Faust's address two of them accepted his invitation to remain for special prayer for their conversion.

Are our Readers Aware that the Fund for the support of Rev. G. W. Sharp, our Sunday School Missionary in the South West is running out? Mr. Sharp has done a great work in Missouri, and during the winter he assisted in the distribution of supplies in Nebraska and Kansas. We believe our readers desire to keep him in the field and that it is only necessary to remind them that funds are needed and they will supply them. Mr. Sharp is too useful a man to be given up.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey, writing from Mexico on April 8, says: "Mr. Moody and I held our first meetings in this city yesterday. The attendance was large and the interest great. Last week we had three days' conference with the missionaries of Mexico at Toluca, which was spiritually profitable to all who were there. When we leave here we go to Fort Worth, Tex., where a Tabernacle capable of holding from five to six thousand persons is being built for our meetings. We were much surprised and pleased to find so many copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD being taken down here in Mexico."

THE TRUE UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD.

A Sermon delivered in the First Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga., by the Pastor, Rev. J. B. Hawthorne, D.D. Text: Ephesians 1: 10: "That he might gather together in one, all things in Christ."

THE ultimatum of Christianity, for this world, is the unification of all mankind in one spiritual, harmonious, happy brotherhood. The realization of this aim will be the consummation of Christ's redemptive work. There is in man a craving for some broader, stronger, brotherhood than that of the nation. Christ has provided for a kingdom, or a brotherhood, which comprehends all nationalities and all races and classes of mankind. For this humanity sighs, and it will be satisfied with nothing less than this.

This dream of universal brotherhood found a very imperfect expression in those ancient empires which sought to gather all races and peoples under one governmental head. Those vast empires were created and held together not merely by physical force, but largely by that human instinct which seeks brotherhood with the whole human race. In their ignorance and depravity they became the victims ot the fatal delusion that this union of all the peoples of the earth must be accomplished by the sword.

Many years ago a young Englishman expressed the wish that he might live to see the day when the continent of Europe should be united under one government. England's last Poet-Laureate gave expression to a larger and grander aspiration when he sang of "The Parliament of Man and the Federation of the World." Many have been the schemes which human wisdom has proposed for the realization of the world's dream of universal brotherhood. They have all failed. They failed because they ignored the truth of God as to the radical cause of the divided condition of the human family, and the means of restoring harmony. The Bible, which Robert Ingersoll calls "the most infamous book in the universe," contains the wisdom of God, and anv philanthropic scheme that is not founded upon it is doomed to inglorious defeat. This Book tells us that sin is and the persistent disturber of the human race. Sin separates man from God, and man from man. Sin, in its last analysis, is selfishness pure and simple. It is the exaltation of our selfish gratifications above the will of God and the interests of our fellow men. The first act of human disobedience was dictated by selfishness, and the same is true of every subsequent act. The Bible teaches that the true centrality is God. Sin, is the great divider of mankind. It is the implacable foe of all human relationships. It opposes the family. It declares that the Christian law which binds a man to one woman and a woman to one man, and makes husband and wife as one flesh, is despotic, and therefore should not be obeyed. It is the enemy of the nation. It inspires man to despise civil authority, and to plot treason aginst the state.

If selfishness be the cause of all human divisions, the only way to heal these divisions and unite men in one universal brotherhood is to cure the world of selfishness. This is just what Jesus Christ, the Second Adam, came into the world to do. By his benevolent life and atoning death he laid the foundations of a kingdom which shall dethrone selfishness in the human breast, and bring all men into blissful fellowship with God and sweetest harmony with one another.

The church is the highest social expression of the kingdom which Christ implants in the hearts of men. The church is not an after-thought. It is not a mere accidental feature of Christian progress. It is not an association of Christian people merely for mutual edification, comfort and advancement. It is not a mere support to which the believer may cling until he is able to do without it. The church is an end in itself. It is a spiritual finality. It begins on earth, and will continue forever in heaven.

The man who is prepared by divine grace for church membership is one who has begun to live unselfiishly—to think about the interests of other people, and to deny himself for the betterment of their condition. How natural it is that such a man should want to associate himself with those who have experienced the same divine transformation. That man is sure to get into some local church. He is sure to knock at the door of some company of organized believers, and say: "Open unto me, for your God shall be my God, your work shall be my work, your sorrows shall be my sorrows, your burdens shall be my burdens, your songs shall be my songs, and your heritage shall be my portion forever." In a local congregation, or church, made up of such men, we have a specimen, but a very imperfect specimen of what the social life of the world will be, when all the peoples of the earth are united under Christ, and dwell together in Christian love and peace.

Principles of Union.

A brief study of the prayer which Christ taught his disciples will enable us to see the spirit that must characterize the church, and the work that must be done by the church, in order that the world's dream of universal brotherhood may be realized. Up to the present period the church has but dimly comprehended the sublime significance of this prayer. It is just beginning to see that when the Christian uses this prayer, he invokes upon all mankind the blessings which he asks for himself. It is just beginning to realize that to use this form of prayer, is to ask God for a complete overturning of the social order of the world. It is just beginning to understand that no man can with sincerity offer this prayer until, like Ignatius, he is prepared to stand against the world. The Church of the living God is moving. It is steadily rising into higher light. It is growing into grander conceptions of God, and of its own mission and possibilities. When it reaches the point where it can clearly comprehend the whole spirit and sweep of the Lord's Prayer, and can respond with one universal Amen to every truth and aspiration which it expresses, then we shall see nations born to God in a day, and every kindred, tongue and tribe moving up to take its place under the banner of the universal King.

Let us look at some parts of this prayer. Consider the opening words of it—"Our Father who art in heaven." My brother, if you know the meaning of these words, you must know that in using them you declare your faith in the brotherhood of men, and the equality of all men in the love of God. You profess to be who "so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life." When you say, "Our Father who art in heaven," you utter the most revolutionary sentiment that ever vibrated the air of this planet. If you mean it, in every fibre of your being you are a revolutionist, and you are using every resource of your redeemed nature to exterminate everything in the social world which separates men, and keeps back the glorious era of brotherhood.

You speak to God as "Our Father." That means that the millionaire and the pauper, the railroad manager and the brakeman, the prince and the peasant, the lordly senator and the scavenger, are brothers. It means that the divisions between human beings made by clothes and creeds, money and culture, position and possession, are but "thin disguises that hide from us the eternal childhood of the soul." It means that we will over-ride all these artificial barriers, and extend to rich and poor, lettered and unlettered, high and low, the hand of fraternity. It means that when you pray you speak to God not only for yourself, but for all humanity. It means that you stand on a level with fifteen hundred millions of human beings, and that you covet for each of them the blessing you seek for yourself. If you understandingly and sincerely look up to God and say, "Our Father," you are a friend to foreign missions; you recognize the obligation to "go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature;" your ear is open to every Macedonian cry; your heart is sensitive to the wail of human suffering, whether it come from the home of your next door neighbor, or from the hut of the Esquimaux in the far off land of eternal winter. All men are your brothers, and you stand ready to help them according to your opportunity and ability.

True Reverence.

"Hallowed be thy name." God has revealed himself to us in humanity. He made himself a man, and in the person of that man Jesus Christ, he dwelt among us full of grace and truth. His name is Emmanuel—God with us—God in our nature, and in our world. So real is this that he could say, "He that receiveth you, receiveth me," and "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me. Therefore, we reverence God when we reverence the humanity with which he identified himself, and through which he revealed his eternal wisdom, love, and power. To dishonor man is to dishonor God. To insult a poor factory-girl, to abuse a penniless and sore-footed tramp, to withhold from a needle-woman the just reward of her patient toil, to enveigle an unsuspecting youth into a gambling house, or to put the intoxicating cup to his lips, to rob a fellow-man of his money or his freedom, or his character, is a profanity a thousand times more wicked and damnable than any misuse of God's name, or any desecration of temples and shrines consecrated to his worship.

"Thy kingdom come." What is the kingdom of God? A distinguished theological writer says, "It is the dominion of the law of love in the whole life of man, with all the activities and processes." I do not believe that a better definition of the kingdom of God could be given. Christ never provided for the division of a man's life into the secular and sacred, or the economic and the spiritual. He commands men everywhere to organize their lives under the same law of love that ruled his own life, and that was interpreted by his sacrifice on the Cross. That law knows no such distinctions as sacred and secular. It demands that whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, we shall do it to the glory of God. It demands that a man should be just as benevolent in his business and politics as he is in his prayers, and just as holy on Monday as on Sunday.

The Law of Life.

To pray, "Thy kingdom come," is to pledge ourselves to prepare the way of that kingdom in our homes, in our business, in our pleasures, and in our politics. Are we redeeming this sacred pledge? Does Christ rule at your fireside? Does his great law of love regulate you and your household? If the Divine Master should come in visible form, and abide with you as he did at the house of Lazarus and his sisters, would he find your domestic affairs in such harmony with his will as to make him feel at home? Could you welcome him to your counting-room? Would you feel no embarrassment at having him look through your ledger? Could you look into his face and say, "Master, this house is under the law of the Golden Rule; in all my transactions with customers, and in all my intercourse and dealings with my employees, I guard their interests as sacredly as my own?" What about your social pleasures? Do you belong to a club? Is it a place to which you could invite your blessed Lord? If it is not, are you honestly doing yout utmost to make it such a place? Does Christ rule your political life? Do you vote as you pray? Do you support only such measures as you believe to be in harmony with God's law of love? Are you bravely battling for the triumph of Christian ethics in the politics and government of your country? To all this you solemnly pledge yourself when you pray, "Thy kingdom come."

"Thy will be done as in heaven so in earth." It is the doing of God's will that makes heaven. The unfallen angels and the glorified saints have heaven in all of its ineffable fulness, because they know no will but God's. Their solitary aim is t please God by a life of complete absorptic in his service. To such there shall be r more night, no more sorrow, no more pai no more want. They bask in the brigh ness of an unsetting sun, drink from pere nial fountains of joy, robe themselves beauty more resplendent than the gorgeo colors of the dying day, and revel amid tl music of golden harps by angel finge touched.

Heaven begins with us on earth. Tl kingdom of heaven is within you. It within you just to the extent that you a obedient to the will of your Father heaven. Heaven is harmony, and ha mony is happiness, and happiness is t consciousness of living for God and wi God. Hell begins on earth and continu through eternity. Self-will asserting its against the will of God makes discord, a discord is the very essence of hell. It is t dominion of self-will that separates a m from fellowship from God, and sinks hi into that "blackness of darkness" throu which no star floats to tell of coming da

When you pray that God's will be do on earth as it is in heaven, you pledge yo own life unreservedly to God's service. Y solemnly promise that every exertion your being shall be an honest effort please him. God has a will concerni everything within the sphere of hum thought, feeling and activity. There is work in which man engages, nothi which his thoughts cherish, or his energi pursue, that should not be subjected to t will of God. God has a will concerning yo domestic life. Will you seek to know it a obey it? To all this you solemnly pled yourself when you pray that God's will done on earth as it is in heaven.

The Family Table.

"Give us this day our daily bread This is a prayer not for yourself and fa ily only, but for every human being wl treads the soil and breathes the atmosphe of earth. In answering this prayer, God providence must act through human i strumentality. God puts bread into t hovel of the sick pauper through those wl have bread enough and to spare. Wh you pray, "Give us this day our dai bread," you pledge yourself to use yo faculties and all your possessions in a w that will be helpful to others in procuri their daily bread. It is the disregard this obligation by men of capital and co mercial skill, that makes distress snd des tution in the land. If the spirit of t Lord's Prayer ruled the whole realm material industries, there would never another famine, or another financ panic, while the world lasts. I have r time to discuss other parts of this pra er. Let it suffice to say that, from begi ning to end, it expresses that law of lo upon which the kingdom of God is foun ed, and the universal observance of whi will be the realization of the world's drea of universal brotherhood.

God's great scheme of gathering in o all things in Christ, contemplates, first all, the union of his people. Before Go will is done on earth as it is in heaven, l people will be of one mind. They will agr in their interpretations of the revealed w of their heavenly Father. They will rea this unity of understanding and faith wh all are thoroughly imbued with the spirit the Lord's prayer. Absolute obedience the spirit of the Lord's prayer will unite t whole Christian world in one Lord, o faith, and one baptism. The inevital sequence of this unity of spirit and und standing, will be organic union. Sectaria ism will cease, denominational lines w cease, denominational lines will be oblit ated, denominational ensigns and nam will disappear, and the now dissever parts of the Lord's army will come togeth in one body, and present to the world unbroken front—a solid phalanx of sacr mental chivalry. When the people of t living God, by growing into the spirit the Lord's prayer, have reached this uni and union, they will exert a power to whi the whole world must speedily succum Then the last infidel voice shall be silenc forever; then will honest doubters doubt more; then will pagan superstitions disa pear, like mists before the morning su and pagan nations wheel into line and ke step to the music of the Gospel. Th shall every form of despotism, wrong a injustice, perish. Then shall every m love his neighbor as himself, and the wor see fulfilled its long lingering, and lon cherished dream and hope of univers brotherhood.

HE PROPHET OF THE EXILE.

Th Condition of the Time and the Peop when Ezekiel Wrote his Message.*

EZEKIEL was one of the priests who went into captivity with King Jehoiachin, in the year 597 B. C., and the whole of his prophetic career falls after that event. Of his previous life and circumstances we have no direct information, beyond the fact that he was a priest and that his father's name was Buzi. One or two interences, however, may be regarded as reasonably certain. We know that that first deportation of Judeans to Babylon was confined to the nobility, the men of war and the craftsmen: and since Ezekiel was never a soldier nor an artisan, his place in the train of captives must have been due to his social position. He must have belonged to the upper ranks of the priesthood who formed part of the aristocracy of Jerusalem. A careful study of his book gives the impression that he was no longer a young man at the time when he received his call to the prophetic office. This impression is confirmed by the fact that he was married and had a house of his own from the commencement of his work, and probably at the time of his captivity. But the most important fact of all is that Ezekiel had lived through a period of unprecedented public calamity, and one fraught with the most momentous consequences for the future of religion. Moving in the highest circles of society, in the centre of the national life, he must have been fully cognizant of the grave events in which no thoughtful observer could fail to recognize the tokens of the approaching dissolution of the Hebrew state.

By the time of Josiah's death, Ezekiel was able to take an intelligent interest in public affairs. He lived through the troubled period that ensued in the full consciousness of its disastrous import for the fortunes of his people, and occasional references to it are to be found in his writings. He remembers and commemorates the sad fate of Jehoahaz, the king of the people's choice, who was dethroned and imprisoned by Pharaoh Necho during the short interval of Egyptian supremacy. The next king, Jehoiakim, received the throne as a vassal of Egypt, on condition of paying a heavy annual tribute. His son, Jehoiachin, who hardly seated on the throne, when a Babylonian army appeared before the gates of Jerusalem. The siege ended in a capitulation, and the king, the queen-mother, the army and nobility, a section of the priests and the prophets, and all the skilled artisans were transported to Babylon. The object of the captivity was of course to deprive the nation of its natural leaders, its head and its hands, and leave it incapable of organized resistance to the Chaldeans.

The exiles were not treated as prisoners or as slaves. They appear to have been distributed in villages in the fertile territory of Babylon, and to have formed themselves into separate communities under the elders, who were the natural authorities in a simple Semitic society. A lively intercourse with the mother country was kept up, and the exiles were perfectly informed of all that was going on in Jerusalem. There were no doubt personal reasons for their keen interest in the doings of their countrymen at home. The exiles had been compelled to leave their children behind them. They appear also to have had to sell their estates hurriedly on the eve of their departure, and such transactions necessarily turning to the advantage of the purchasers, left a deep grudge in the breast of the sellers. Those who remained in the land exulted in the calamity that had brought so much profit to themselves, and thought themselves perfectly secure in so doing, because they regarded their brethren as men driven out for their sins from Jehovah's heritage. The exiles on their part, affected the utmost contempt for the pretensions of the upstart plebeians, who were carrying things with a high hand at Jerusalem. Like the French emigrants in the time of the Revolution, they felt that their country was being ruined for want of proper guidance and experienced statesmanship. Both Jeremiah and Ezekiel regarded the exiles as the better part of the nation, and the nucleus of the Messianic community of the future. For the present, however, there does not seem to have been much to choose, in point of religious belief and practice, between the two sections of the people.

THE VISTA OPENED.

The Plan of Future Ages of the World's Existence as Indicated in Prophecy.*

BY GEORGE F. TRENCH, B. A.

TO those who live shut in from the view of the surrounding world, circumscribed by an impenetrable screen of buildings, woods, or shrubberies, it is a great relief to have an opening made—a vista of the scene beyond. This is true, whether the scene let into sight is beautiful or plain; for the eye, like the mind, loves expansion. But if, in addition to liberty and and range, a new harvest of beauty and enchantment is obtained, what words can describe that joy?

There is a region on the chart of futurity, not usually so much studied as others, as to which, having had an experience of this kind, I desire to share it with those by whom the prophetical Scriptures are valued and enjoyed.

Not so very long ago Christian people generally saw nothing ahead but "the Judgment Day," the last day, the general dissolution of all things, and eternity beyond. But students of prophecy, telescope in hand, began to discern intermediate events—ranges of hills, so to speak, and mountains beyond them—and have proclaimed their discoveries with such a fervent "Eureka! Eureka!" that nowadays the old, crude, ignorant belief is well-nigh broken down.

Instead of talking about the "last day," like Martha in John 11, the saints are expecting, as she was then taught (vv. 25, 26, R.V.), the transformation of the living and the resurrection of the sleeping, at the coming of the Lord; an event which, instead of closing the world's history, will—after the brief but most eventful epoch that it has ever passed through for widespread suffering, cruelty, and war—introduce the reign of Christ on earth, and be in fact a morning star to tell of the coming sunrise.

This Reign of Christ, long supposed to be a great spiritual revival in the Church, has been clearly discovered to be, instead, the fulfilment of a hundred promises to Israel, of restoration to their land, and, under David's Son as King, to their national supremacy in all the earth. Its very length is known; because absolutely and unequivocally foretold. It will last a thousand years; and terminate, melancholy to discern, not in a glorious expansion to infinite and universal prosperity and blessing, but in a great and general revolt—a tremendous and world-wide upheaval in rebellion against the King, his chosen people, and his seat of government.

So far, almost all the more thorough and practical students of prophecy are agreed. As for those who still cling to the old theories already referred to, I shall not contend with them. Our present object is to press inquiry into the regions beyond, and to discover, if we can, whether that thousand years' reign, with its furthest margin of violent breaker and surge is, or is not, the final period of limited duration before the eternal age begins.

From the mountain height which revelation affords, it has already been discovered that the stretch of waters that our forefathers had taken for the ocean is but an inland sea, circumscribed by most definite borders. But what is there beyond it? Is that shining field of light, whose calm face looks up to the ethereal blue, reflecting its tints beyond the broken edge of cliff and foam—is that eternity?

IN GETHSEMANE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing May 5. Mark 14: 32-52.

IN spite of all that has been spoken and written about it, the scene in Gethsemane must ever be a scene of mystery. It is impossible for man in his present condition, in the flesh, to know what it was that caused that exquisite suffering, which wrung from those patient lips the cry, "Take away this cup from me." Like the time of temptation in the wilderness, the night in the garden was an experience unique in the world's history. There are immense possibilities in man for mental suffering. Bereavement, cruel wrong, remorse—these and other ills can wring the heart and produce anguish more distressing than physical pain. But none of these was present in that scene of agony. In that beautiful life there could be no self-reproach, no shame, no vain regrets, such as make life unendurable for some men. Yet Christ suffered mental agony so severe that his nature quivered under it, and showed how close is the association between mind and body. What mental torture that must have been that could make the pores of the skin open and let the blood exude, we cannot conceive. It must have been terrific. Yet the words of his prayer indicate the unconquerable spirit within him. He pleads that the cup may be taken from him, but not unless it be in accord with his Father's will, "Not my will, but thine be done." That will he would have supreme at any cost to himself. We can imagine such an expression coming from the lips of some sensitive child, lying on the operating table of a hospital, as he asks his father if a dreaded operation really is unavoidable. That in some way it was necessary that the cup should be drained to the dregs we must believe, otherwise that pathetic prayer would have been granted. God would not have allowed him to suffer like that if the end for which he came could have been accomplished in any other way. The fact is full of sad significance. Sin must indeed be a horrible thing if it cost so much to redeem men from it. We have heard of a young man, the son of a brilliant statesman, realizing the evil of his ways by his father's sacrifice. He knew that his father had toiled and struggled, had labored night and day to attain a certain position. At last the prize of his labor, the hope of his life of which he had thought by day and dreamed of by night was within his grasp. In that hour of triumph the news was brought to him that his beloved son had fallen under the fascination of evil, and that bad companions had brought him to the verge of ruin. The father was heart-broken, but he determined to sacrifice everything to save his son. He resigned the office he had just accepted, sold his property to make good his son's defalcation, and taking the young man with him left his native country to break up his son's connections, and to give all his time and all his magnificent force of character to the weaning of the youth from the evil, and making of him a strong and virtuous man. "I am not worth such a sacrifice, father," he said, "Let me die and do you enjoy the fruits of your efforts." But the father refused and gave up his ambitions and hopes for his son's sake. The youth could never forgive himself for the consequences of his wrong doing; but he was saved, and afterward distinguished himself in the career his father gave up for his sake. He learned two things from the conduct of his father. One was the awful nature of the crime he had committed; and the other, how much his father loved him to sacrifice all that he held dear for his sake. Similar lessons we learn from the agony in the Garden. Though we cannot understand it, we know that it was to redeem men from evil that Christ suffered so; and we perceive what his love for the race must have been, to make him willing to persevere to the end, when redemption could be secured in no other way. Such love demands a better return than it receives. There can be no clearer proof of depravity than for any man to cling to his sin and persist in it in spite of such a sacrifice. To persist in evil after knowing what Christ bore to redeem us from it, implies hardness of heart and cruel wickedness of the deepest dye. Every individual ought to resolve that in his case, at least, that agony shall not have been endured in vain.

A FLOURISHING ASSOCIATION.

On this page is a picture of the new building secured by the Young Men's Christian Association of Geneva, N. Y. It has cost about forty-seven thousand dollars, and at its opening only two thousand dollars remained to be paid. The building is a remarkably handsome one, considering the size of the town, which has but little over ten thousand population. The first floor is rented out as stores. On the second floor are the library and reading-room, the Secretary's office, auditorium, parlor and amusement room. The gymnasium, which is on the third story, is seventy by eighty feet in area, and on the same floor are the rooms devoted to the Boys' Department. The library contains about fifteen hundred volumes. The Association was organized in 1886, and has now about two hundred members. It is gratifying to notice that the recent report shows an unusual number of religious meetings, with good attendance. It is evident that Geneva has not fallen into the fashion of forgetting that the Association is a Christian Association, and does not exist exclusively for athletics and amusements. We may hope that in the new building the Association will become more than ever a means of spiritual helpfulness to the young men of the town.

THE TENEMENT HOUSE CHAPTER.

The sixth annual meeting of the Tenement House Chapter of King's Daughters was held on April 10 in the United Charities Building, New York. It is very gratifying to find from the reports submitted, that the Chapter is extending its work and that its sphere of usefulness is enlarging as opportunities open. The work for which it was started and which it still carries on is to assist the summer corps of physicians sent out among the tenements by the Health Board. Whenever the physicians find patients who require more care than they have time to give, the Chapter sends in a trained nurse, and medicines and food when necessary, and continues its attentions until the good work is completed.

That was the extent of the work of the organization at first. During the six years of its existence it has broadened its labors in a quiet way until now it has headquarters at 77 Madison street, near Chatham Square, with a mothers' club, a girls' club, a boys' club, a kindergarten, "The King's Garden," sewing classes, a library, a visitor for the neighborhood, etc.

Mr. Jacob Riis who has been active in the work from the beginning made an earnest address urging the claims of the library the Chapter is forming for circulation among the tenements. He said: "It is a very necessary thing that we should put the right kind of books into the hands of the people. In the course of my work recently I have come in contact with two suicides, a man and a woman, whose lives were sacrificed to misguided reading. In the pocket of this girl, only twenty-one years old, were found two or three love stories that were the worst trash. There was absolutely no reason outside of her reading for her taking her own life. Upon the body of the man were found numberless newspaper clippings relating to suicide and in his pocket was found an infidel book.

"The greatest work this chapter is doing," said Mrs. Lowell, "is the neighborhood work. There ought to be fifty visitors. The greatest service men and women can perform is to go and live among the poor. There are many ways in which they, through their larger opportunities, can give them pleasure. Much can be done to awaken in the poor nobler ideals and ambitions. The reason charity has been discredited is because it has worked with the broken fragments, the drunken and the shiftless, helping as it could, mourning that such things must be, but never asking the reason why or knowing anything of the honest, thrifty poor who live lives of heroism such as we cannot live. There are certain things that the people must have, and there must be some one to cry aloud for them for more space, more air, and better conditions, and this must come from some one who knows them."

MY GARDEN.

IN my bed of asters
Grew a rough-leaved weed,
And I wondered daily
Whence had come the seed;
Still I would not pull it.
But encouraged it to grow,
Just because it had a leaf
That I did not know.

Soon it held a cluster
Of buds, so faintly rose,
That I watched it hourly
To see their lips unclose.
And I greeted, at its blooming,
Something very sweet,
For my weed had proved a primrose,
Blooming at my feet.

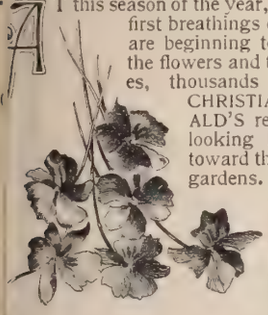
A Flower-Loving Nation.

The Japanese Passion for Beautiful Blossoms—Arranging Flowers a Part of the Popular Education.



AT this season of the year, when the first breathings of Spring are beginning to awaken the flowers and the grasses, thousands of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S readers are looking longingly toward their flower gardens. The love of flowers is universal; but with some nations it is so intense as to amount almost to a passion. In Japan which, probably owing to the war with China, is now prominently before the gaze of the world) this flower-love is really a worship. The knowledge, appreciation and use of flowers is a part of the education of every young Japanese, and a girl or boy who could not artistically arrange a posy, a bouquet, or cut and trim a handful of blossoms and set them properly in a jar or vase, would be considered uncultured indeed.

In Tokio, Yokohama, and indeed all through the island empire, the greatest care and taste are lavished upon the flower-gardens and orchards. In the early blossom-time seasons—the plum trees bloom in February and March—the gardens are crowded with visitors observing the progress of the plants. In the larger cities, the first Sunday after the blossoming of the cherry trees is a public holiday, and people leave the thronged cities to spend the day in the fine gardens of the suburbs, or in some of the numerous tea-houses, which are themselves usually surrounded by flowering vines, or trees heavy with blossoms.

It would open the eyes of some of our own amateur gardeners, were they to visit Tokio, and there witness the wonders of floriculture that are to be seen in the suburbs of that remarkable city. All sorts of curious devices, quaint and picturesque, artificial and grotesque, are skilfully laid out in the flower-beds. Great, fragrant waves of richest color seem to rise out of the ground to delight the senses. Arbors shaded with fruit vines, or wisterias; orange and other trees, laden with blossoms; aged camphor trees distilling a grateful odor; lakes that seem like tiny seas of lotus blossoms—these are only a few of the thousand enchantments of a Japanese garden in midsummer. When the flowers are all in blossom, the streets of every city in the Mikado's kingdom are transformed into little garden patches, by the thousands of venders who keep their hand-carts—brilliant with their loads of red, white, and yellow chrysanthemums—constantly in motion, seeking for customers. Each of these vehicles gives the impression of a moving bank of blossoms. Poor indeed is the Japanese home that cannot afford, in the season, to gratify the taste of its inmates by the purchase of a few pots of flowers.

Gardening comes naturally to Japanese girls and boys, and the gift of a specially fine blossom or a rare specimen affords them the keenest pleasure. Even the girls' own particular holiday, the "Feast of Dolls" in March, and the boys' holiday in May,—both very generally celebrated in Japan—do not afford the younger people as much genuine gratification as a romp in a flower garden in the "season of blossoms."

The Charm of Good Conversation.

There is no charm more simple, more pure, more living, writes Mrs. Alma D. Whittaker, than that which gleams out along the threads of exquisitely woven conversation. It may be described as verbal architecture, verbal sculpture, verbal painting, and lastly, conversation is verbal music, appealing by sound to that sense of the beautiful which is innate in every human nature, without which the world would be void, and life a waste. Again, we should never confuse talking with conversation. Talking is tuning the instrument, conversation is playing upon it. Good conversation cannot be a monologue—the most musical instrument, if played upon continually becomes an unmitigated bore; but it is an intelligent orchestra, in which all the instruments bear a part."

Fold the Lambs Early.

There is not the least doubt that a little child from the first distinct actings of its intellect on unseen and spiritual things may have a child-like love for God and a child-like wish to do his will. While we must not look, writes a country pastor, for the maturity of piety which an adult may exhibit, yet a child may be as distinctly a Christian and as truly pious according to a child's capacity. Why should not conversion be as real, radical and positive at five years of age as at fifty? Whatever God does is well done, and he can give his grace when he will. But it ought not to be expected that a child Christian eight or ten years old will be just the same in every respect as a man or woman Christian. Children are babes in Christ. Therefore, when a child unites with the church a great duty is laid on the church. The remark is sometimes made that the responsibility of joining the church is so great that no child should assume this relation. The responsibility is serious, but it is more serious for the church than for the child. It was a wise shepherd's advice: "Get the lambs folded early, and then keep the fold warm." There could be no wiser for us. Get the children, the lambs of Christ's flock, folded early, and then keep the fold warm! The church cannot take too good care of its child converts. The most loving and tender Christian nurture is their due.

Female Education in India.

One of the leading Mohammedan citizens of Bombay, the Hon. Budrudeen Tyabjee, has long taken the lead in the question of female education. He has bestowed on all his daughters an education that fits them to take their place among their English sisters in the higher circles of European society in Bombay. One of the members of his household, the wife of Mr. Abar Tyabjee, Judge of the Baroda High Court, was the first Mohammedan woman to pay a visit to the House of Commons. It would be well if all Mohammedan gentlemen were to follow Mr. Tyabjee's enlightened example and educate their daughters to keep pace with the educated young men of the rising generation, fourteen out of fifteen of whom, according to the startling disclosure recently made in the Indian Census Report on Female Education, are now doomed to take as partners women utterly illiterate, and with whom they have no opportunity of thought or feeling. Among Hindu women there are many instances of the highest attainments. Calcutta can boast of several that have taken high degrees in medicine and science.

Childish Burdens.

Every burden of life—and life's burdens seem many—rests at its heaviest on a child's nature. A child is refused more requests than are granted to him. He is subjected to disappointments daily, almost hourly. The baby cannot reach the moon, nor handle papa's razor, nor pound the looking-glass, nor pull over the tea-pot, nor creep into the fire. The older child cannot eat everything he wants to, nor go out at all times, nor have papa and mamma ever at his side. Then there come school-tasks to shrink from, and the jealousies and unkindnesses of playmates and companions to grieve over. And as more is known of life and the world, and the inevitable struggles with temptation, and of the injustice and wrongs which must in so many cases be suffered, it becomes harder and harder for a young person to see only the brighter side of human existence, and to bear up bravely and cheerily under all that tends to sadden and oppress us. There are more clouds in the sky of life's April than of life's August.

SOMEWHERE LAND.

SOMEWHERE the sorrows vanish, somewhere the burdens fall,
Somewhere there's crown of toiling, somewhere there's love for all;
Somewhere this wound hath healing, somewhere we'll understand—
Somewhere, and somewhere, and somewhere—O where is the somewhere land?

The "somewhere land" is heaven—'tis there the burdens fall,
'Tis there the sorrows vanish, 'tis there there's love for all;
'Tis there the crown awaits us; 'tis there we'll understand,
'Tis there the wounds have healing—for that's the somewhere land.

But where's the somewhere country? the heaven where sorrows cease?
The place where Jesus dwelleth, his home of love and peace.
He's King of that fair country, and Lord of that bright land;
He banisheth all sorrow, with his dear, loving hand.

Then patiently abide thee; the somewhere land's not far,
'Tis just above the sunrise, just over the morning star,
A few more nights of sadness, a few more days of care,
We'll reach the "somewhere country," and rest forever there.

FOR THE BURDENED.

THE poet Shelley relates common experience in these lines:

I could lie down like a tired child,
And weep away the life of care,
Which I have borne and yet must bear.

While our life here and its cares co-exist or live and die together, let us also remember that load becomes lighter which is cheerfully borne, and the greatest Teacher has said, "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer."

While patience may be bitter, its fruit is sweet, and acting as heroically as the small boy in Massachusetts, who, being severely punished by his teacher, with the tears rapidly coursing his cheeks, nevertheless smiled, and to the teacher's question answered, "I know it hurts, but I smile because it's intended for my good." God has declared, "He doth not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men," and it is also written, "All things work together for good to them that love God." We are not asked to see now how they so work, but to believe, waiting patiently for him, not drawing the curtains or closing the blinds of the soul, thereby losing the sunshine and the blessing upon its appearing. Thus our doubts become traitors, making us lose the good we might win.

A pastor, influenced irresistibly by the feeling that a poor, faithful member of his flock needed aid in the payment of her rent, called at her dwelling. No answer came to his knock, the blinds were closed, and to all appearance the dwelling-place was deserted. He left somewhat disappointed. Meeting her some days afterward, he explained the circumstances of his call, receiving the response:

"Why, dominie, was that you? I closed the house to avoid the landlord, not having all his rent yet. You called to help me, and I did not let you in."

How often, indeed, do we keep out the landlord of our soul, the loving Saviour, while vainly striving alone to arrange some burden, or adjust some care, not designed for our vexation, but of greatest use by inclining us unto fellowship with him, and helpfully again revealing his compassion.

Therefore, when the clouds darkly gather, and troubles come swifter than the things desired, let us cheerily urge our onward way, singing with Bryant,

For God has marked each sorrowing day,
And numbered every secret tear;
And heaven's long age of bliss shall pay
For all his children suffer here.

—F. M. EVARTS.

The Second Summer,

many mothers believe, is the most precarious in a child's life; generally it may be true, but you will find that mothers and physicians familiar with the value of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk do not so regard it.

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

CHAPTER XIII.

Accused.

SOME characters seem to be peculiar in their excellences as in their defects. Mrs. Wilson was one of these. She was a loving mother and wife, but the family seemed to absorb her entire stock of this article, and there was none left over for anybody else, not even enough for a cat or dog or bird; so outside of her own family she was not known as a loving woman, and although she had the respect of many, she was not loved by any. She was a very religious woman, but her religion consisted entirely in forms and ceremonies; she was very high church, and thought far more about the altar cloth, the crosses and vestments, and the proper time to bow, than what she was saying, and to whom she was addressing her prayers. It would have shocked her more had the congregation remained seated when the wardens presented the offertory to the clergyman, than to have known that there was nothing on the plates. She would have thought, with Emma, that it was "perfectly dreadful" if the minister, by mistake, had worn a black instead of a purple stole; if he had forgotten to turn his back to the congregation and bow to the east when pronouncing the benediction, she would have thought it more awful than if he had forgotten several of the prayers; in fact her religion consisted entirely in what was done inside the church. She went to church to perform her religous duties, and felt when she left church she had done all that religion called upon her to do for the week. If she had seen her clergyman (although there was not the slightest danger of him ever being caught in such a position), we say if she had seen him standing in a boat with rough, barefooted fishermen for his companions, and preaching without a surplice to a promiscuous crowd on the shore, she would have been horrified to see him thus destroying the respectability of the church, and making religion common and vulgar, and she never would have listened to him again.

She was also a charitable woman, but her charity was as formal as her religion; we separate the two, because in her mind charity and religion were two separate things. She was president of a very high-toned Ladies' Guild, and gave liberally (the names and amounts were always published once a year) from, as she said, a sense of duty, but she was never known to give a cent to a begging child, or a crust to a beggar at her door; she said a sense of justice to the deserving poor would not allow her to give to those who asked charity, and yet she was never known to climb to a garret, or go down to a cellar in search of those too proud or unable to ask; no one sent a more costly wreath than she did to lay upon the coffin of a departed friend, or paid more for costly flowers to decorate the church at Easter, yet when asked to join a Flower Mission, the object of which was to carry flowers to the sick rooms of the poor, she became almost indignant. No, the duty she owed society (society with her meant her own particular set), and a sense of justice to the poor themselves, would prevent her, if nothing else; flowers would be very much out of place with such surroundings, the people to whom they were sent could not appreciate such things, and it [illegible] would be engendering pride, which would make them feel above their station when they recovered, and if there was one thing more than another that made her angry, it was when persons tried to get above their station, when they had the presumption to force their way into good society where they were not wanted. She had no mercy on such people, and this is the more to be wondered at when it was known that her own father was a carpenter, and she a shop girl when Mr. Wilson married her.

It was this feeling that made her dislike Alice, and the dislike grew stronger every time she met her; here was a drawing-teacher who put on the airs of a lady, acted as if she was an equal. There was an ease and confidence in all her actions and words that bespoke the lady in spite of her rather shabby dress and occcupation, and although Alice was modest, unpresuming, and a teacher, she was always a lady. And it was really her superiority in education, deportment, language, and ability (though unconsciously shown by Alice), that aggravated Mrs. Wilson, although she would not have admitted this even to herself.

When Alice next appeared at Mrs. Wilson's, she was shown into the library instead of the sitting-room, where she had been in the habit of giving the lessons. Mrs. Wilson was there alone to receive her; she pointed to a chair, Alice felt a chill creep over her, for she could see from the cold, stern look on Mrs. Wilson's face, and her peculiar reception that something was wrong, and she felt frightened and sank into a seat.

Miss Brown, as I believe you falsely call yourself," Mrs. Wilson began, "A sense of justice and a duty I owe society, and particularly my own family, compels me to meet you alone this morning, for after what has happened, of course, I would not allow you to give my daughters another lesson, or even to speak to them; but if you make an humble confession and restore a certain article, you will be permitted to leave the house, never to re-enter it; and I am only thus lenient, because my foolish and soft-hearted daughter Louie (whose kindness you have repaid with base ingratitude), has pleaded for you."

Alice had sat with open mouth and eyes, completely bewildered; at last she said, "Will you be kind enough to tell me what you are talking about and how I have offended you, and what I am expected to confess? I am utterly at a loss to understand you, madam."

"Such cool impudence might pass for innocence with some people," said Mrs. Wilson; "but I am not so easily deceived, your own guilty conscience will tell you what you have done, and you will return the bracelet, and any other article you may have taken within two hours, or I shall have you arrested, for I have all the proof necessary."

Now it flashed upon the mind of Alice that this woman was calling her a thief, and instead of bursting into tears or fainting away, as might have been expected, she sprang to her feet, her eyes flashing, and her face scarlet; she trembled with excitement and indignation; there was no look of fear in her eye, nor tremor in her voice, as she said in a clear, defiant voice, "Do I understand you to charge me with stealing?"

"I do," said Mrs. Wilson.

"Then, let me tell you," said Alice, "that you are doing me a foul injustice. I am no more capable of stooping to such an act than you are. You suppose because I have to earn my living and because I do not wear fine dresses I must be mean and unprincipled, but poverty and meanness are not necessarily allied. Though I am very poor I have been trained as the highest born ladies are and I should scorn to steal or do anyone wrong. I should suffer less in dying of starvation than I should suffer from my conscience if I did anything dishonest. I know not and care not what it is you call 'proof' of my dishonesty. The 'proof' is false throughout. There is no one under your roof who would shrink from dishonesty more than I would." Alice scarcely knew what she was saying, she was so angry.

Mrs. Wilson listened in amazement. This was not what she had expected, and each word seemed to prick her like a needle. She turned very pale, then she drew a long breath, and said, "You insulting woman, this is the way you treat my offer of mercy, is it? You dare to add insult to your dishonesty."

"Do not dare to say another word to me, now or at any other time. I should blush to have you recognize me on the street; I defy you to do your worst, and I believe you have only made this charge as an excuse for not paying me the small sum you owe me, but you are welcome to it, for I would starve rather than take a cent of your money, although I have earned it honestly," and Alice swept out of the room and was at the hall door before Mrs. Wilson had recovered from her astonishment; then she rushed after her and shouted as Alice descended the marble steps, "You shall sleep in a cell to-night, you impudent girl, and nothing shall prevent me from doing my duty," and she slammed the door on the retreating figure."

CHAPTER XIV.

A Champion.

Alice walked at a rapid pace until her passion began to cool; she hardly knew what had happened, she felt so dazed, then a reaction set in, and it required all her willpower to keep herself from crying aloud on the street.

"Miss Mapleton, I believe," said a gentleman who had taken several steps by her side before he spoke.

Alice was startled by the voice, for her mind was so pre-occupied that she had not noticed him.

"Sir," she said as she looked with a half-frightened gaze and exclamation. He was a handsome man, with dark blue eyes and heavy brown mustache (this she said afterward was all she saw), and had every appearance of a gentleman.

"Excuse my presumption, and the liberty I take in addressing you on the street, but believe me when I say that it is absolutely necessary, when I tell you that I speak in the interest of a friend of yours now in Mexico, and for your own and your mother's welfare, I know you will not be offended."

The mention of the friend in Mexico was enough to satisfy Alice that she had nothing to fear and also to mantle her face with a blush.

"Please go on, sir; and any information you may be able to give of absent friends will be thankfully received," said Alice, forgetting for the moment what she had just gone through, in her anxiety to hear news of her lover.

"In the first place, Miss Mapleton, I will introduce myself. My name is Graham; I am a detective. Mr. Morgan (whom I may say is a personal friend of mine) had doubts as to the honesty of certain persons connected with your father, and when he found that he had to leave the country on such short notice, and knew that your father was dangerously ill, he asked me not only as an officer, but as a friend, to keep an eye on the firm, and act in your interest should I find it necessary. Then your brother, before he left, when he found that he and his family had been ruined by a dishonest and unprincipled villain, also put the case in my hands; then Mr. Morgan was sent to China and your brother was killed, just when I had the trap ready to spring. My next move was to find you and your mother, which I have been trying to do for months without success. I used all means I could think of, not only because it was very important from a business point of view, but also because my friend Morgan seemed so very, very anxious; indeed, his last request was that I drop everything else and spare neither pains or expense until you were discovered."

"When did you last hear from Mr. Morgan, and how was he?" Alice asked, trying to command her voice, and speak as if she was inquiring after some ordinary friend.

"I received a letter only the other day, and he was then about to start for home."

Alice found it hard to repress her feelings, and the tears which filled her eyes, but only for a moment, and then simply said, "I am so glad to hear it."

"But, Miss Mapleton, what I have to say to-day is of personal importance to yourself, and could not be deferred another hour. Were it not imperative I should not have been so bold as to address you on the street. It is not a good place for private conversation; would you mind stepping into Mr. Jacobs' parlor. I know such a request will appear strange, but it is very important that you should hear at once what I w to say to you."

"I am not only willing, but anxious hear you, Mr. Graham, and as I am quainted with Mr. Jacobs, and have confidence in him as a friend. I know of other place where I would rather go to h what you have to say; I dare not ask to our own rooms, as my mother is an valid, and the least thing agitates her much, that I hide all the unpleasant thi from her that I can."

"Good," said Mr. Graham, as he ope the side door and followed Alice into the tle parlor.

"Good afternoon, my tear young frien said Mr. Jacobs, handing her a chair. "I vas looking some petter dan ven I saw de las' time."

Now, let us get to business at onc said Mr. Graham. "You have no objec to Mr. Jacobs hearing what we have say on this case, have you, Miss?"

"Oh, none whatever. I wish him to st he has been a true friend to me, and I wo trust him as I would a father," said Al

"Dat vas make me feel goot already hear you talk dot vay," said Mr. Jac

"Well, Miss, you must not be offen at any questions I may ask you; they be asked only for your own good."

"I am sure I know of nothing that I w to conceal," said Alice.

"Did you ever leave a bracelet here security on a loan?" asked the detectiv

"Yes," said Alice, turning very rec the face.

The detective opened his eyes with a l of astonishment.

"Dot vas not de von vat dis troubles about," said Mr. Jacobs. "Dot vas no von she took avay last night."

"Did you write that name?" asked G ham showing her the book, which he brought from the shop.

"That is my name, but I never wro there," said Alice.

"You say dot vas your name?" Mr. Jacobs with a puzzled look.

"Yes," said Alice, "do you not remem the last time but one I was here, I told that I had not given you my right na and before I could explain, some pe came in?"

"Yes, now I remember, so you did, F ben come here," when the young came from the front shop at his fath call, Mr. Jacobs asked, "Is dis de yo lady vat left dot brazelet wid you, my so

"No, fader, she is not; I know Brown; she never signed Alice Maple And about that bracelet—I forgot to you that Mr. Briggs called for dat bra a leetle vile ago, and brought de ticket, I couldn't find it."

"Dot vill do, my poy," and Reuben turned to the shop.

"Did not Mrs. Wilson charge you stealing a bracelet to-day?" asked Graham.

"She did," said Alice, as a shu shook her frame, and she burst into te

"I knew by the way you left the hou I saw that you were greatly agitated in tears. Now, have you a very b enemy?" asked the detective.

"I have only one, that I know of in world," said Alice, trying to keep back tears.

"And his name is Jackson?" said Graham.

"How did you know that?" asked in a startled voice.

"Did you know that he was a friend the Wilsons?" he asked, not answe her question.

"Surely not, or I should have fou it out before this through his hatred (w he calls love), if in no other way."

"That is how you are finding it out Graham. One more question: is your sketch b the one with the blue cover?"

"Yes!" said Alice in amazement, "I here, I brought it away to-day."

Mr. Graham took the book, and car ly turned over every leaf as if in searc something. "Ah! it is gone," he said turned the last leaf, "I thought it would "Vat vas it you expects to find?" a Mr. Jacobs.

"Mr. Jackson was at the Wilsons night, and the young ladies were sho him their sketch books, and I saw him something into this one, and it looke me like a pawn ticket," said Mr. Gra

"Were you there?" asked Alice.

"Well, not exactly. I was only wh could see, and not be seen," said Gra with a smile.

Holcomb has asked the Legislature to appropriate $50,000 more for seed supplies. . . . . No one has starved to death in our State; no one has frozen, nor suffered for lack of clothing. . . . We truly appreciate your marked generosity. . . ."

Victims of Dyspepsia

I cannot in one short letter, tell of my sufferings. I would briefly say that I had all the horrors of dyspepsia, insomnia and indigestion. I tried many ways to get relief and failed. Last but not least, I have used about eight bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla, and feel more than 50 per cent. better than I have for three years past; and all this at a cost not so great as three trips to a doctor. I give God the praise for the inspiration that brought out Hood's Sarsaparilla. May its proprietors live long and do good. Of all the preparations extant, Hood's Sarsaparilla is the best for all sufferers with similar complaints. I am a farmer, nearly 58 years of age and weigh 185 lbs." S. E. BAKER, W. Jefferson, O.

A GREAT COUGH REMEDY.

Perhaps you may think that Scott's Emulsion is only useful to fatten babies, to round up the angles and make comely and attractive, lean and angular women, and fill out the hollow cheeks and stop the wasting of the consumptive, and enrich and vitalize the blood of the scrofulous and anæmic persons. It will do all this—but it will do more. It will cure a when the ordinary cough syrups and specifics entirely fail. The cough that lingers after the Grip and Pneumonia will be softened and cured by the balsamic healing and strengthening influences of this beneficent food-medicine, namely, Scott's Emulsion of Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites of Lime and Soda.

Hard, Stubborn Cough

Refuse substitutes. They are never as good.

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE,—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen, in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only gives immediate relief, but grows constant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and [illegible] lungs and delicate habit should read my book on Consumption [illegible] Lungs and Debility, and its successful treatment, showing that incurable disease [illegible] in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Irritability; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many druggists, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

Over One Million Women

Mrs. A. E. Wilcox, voices the opinion of many women when, in a recent number of the Household, she says: "I have recently been experimenting with Cottolene, using it in cooking wherever shortening, other than cream, is required, and I speak from experience when I say it is in every way entirely satisfactory. I do not hesitate to recommend its use in all places where lard or butter is used as shortening, and for all frying purposes. It can be used successfully in any recipe calling for lard or butter, by using one-third the designated quantity."

Mrs. Wilcox expresses the opinion of over a million thoughtful women who have discarded all other shortening, and

A BOX OF GOLD FOR BREAD.

Rev. W. H. Aitken, an evangelist, relates the following interesting incident: "Some time ago, the brother of a friend of mine was coming home from Australia, and when they were about half-way home the ship took fire in mid-ocean. Two boats were lowered. One was a large boat, and into that they managed to fling a considerable quantity of stores—casks of bread, bacon and barrels of water; and into the smaller boat, in the confusion of the moment, they cast a number of cases containing solid gold. The larger boat got nearly all the provisions and no gold. As night came on a stiff breeze sprang up. Four or five stalwart sailors stood up in the small boat, and lifted up a box of gold, and shouted to the other boat, 'Here is $75,000 if you will only give us bread,' and they could not do so! How much less will the rich man's gold avail him in the shipwreck of this world."

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

In Uric Acid Diathesis, Gout, Rheumatism, Bright's Disease, &c.
Its Nerve Tonic Properties.

Dr. Harvey L. Byrd, of Baltimore, President and Professor of Obstetrics and Diseases of Women and Children in the Baltimore Medical College, formerly Professor of Practical Medicine, etc.

"I have witnessed the best results from the action of the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 2, in Chronic Gout, Rheumatic Gout, Rheumatism, Gravel and Stone in the Bladder, and I do not hesitate to express the opinion that in all diseases depending upon or having their origin in Uric Acid Diathesis, it is unsurpassed, if indeed it is equaled, by any water thus far known to the profession.

"It is an admirable general tonic and restorative, increasing the appetite, promoting digestion and invigorating the general health. It is powerfully anti-acid and especially efficacious in what is commonly known as acid dyspepsia. It is strongly commended to a very large class of sufferers by a peculiar power as a nervous tonic and exhilarant, which makes it exceedingly valuable, where there is nothing to contra-indicate its use, in all cases where nervous depression is a symptom.

"It has an ascertained value in Bright's Disease. A knowledge of its action in that disease thus far would seem to warrant the belief that it would in many instances, at least in its early stages, arrest it entirely, and in its more advanced stage prove a decided comfort and palliative."

Dr. J. S. Wellford. Prof. of Diseases of Women and Children, Medical College of Va:

"I have paid a great deal of attention to Urinary Troubles, and have frequently and freely prescribed the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in their treatment, with the very best results. In all the various forms of the Uric Acid Diathesis, whether as well-formed Gravel, Gout or the milder forms of Gouty Dyspepsia or Nettle-rash, in their varieties, I know of no mineral water which I consider at all equal to that of Spring No. 2.

"In many Skin Diseases of old age, dependent on the Uric Acid Diathesis, such as Eczema, etc., this Water acts most beneficially."

This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

MOODY AND SANKEY IN MEXICO.

The Famous Evangelists Preaching the Gospel in the Land of the Aztecs—A Nation Emerging from Priestly Domination into the Light of Religious Liberty.

DWIGHT L. MOODY, Evangelist.

MISSIONARIES and Christian workers throughout Mexico have been greatly cheered by a visit from Messrs Moody and Sankey. A personal letter to the Proprietor of this journal from Mr. [illegible]ey, an extract from which we published last week, announced the arrival of the evangelists in the City of Mexico, and described the great missionary conference which had just taken place at Toluca. Missionaries of all denominations came from all parts of the country to meet the Evangelist. The conference lasted three days, and was inspiring and stimulating in its features. No one knows better than Mr. Moody how to impart good cheer to the Christian worker, and the stirring words with Mr. Sankey's melodious song would awaken the souls of the [illegible]ed men and women who listened to him, and give them new courage and energy to go on with their arduous work. We may hope, too, that at the public meetings in the City of Mexico, where great assemblies of English-speaking residents were gathered, the Spirit of God may have carried the Word home to many hearts. It was a kindly and thoughtful act of the Evangelists to make this journey from Texas to the capital of the sister republic. Christian work there needs encouragement. Not even in heathen lands are the difficulties encountered by the Gospel so formidable and so numerous as in Mexico. Scepticism and prejudice and superstition each hold a position almost impregnable in different classes of society. The fact arises from peculiar social and political conditions. When in 1810, Mexico threw off the yoke of Spain, the Romish priests were the best educated and most cultured of the people. They naturally became dominant, directly, and indirectly, in the new government, and succeeded in acquiring control of many departments. It was not long before patriotic and sagacious citizens discovered that Mexico was still under foreign domination, with the only difference that the mandates came from Rome instead of from Madrid. In the name of religion, Mexico was being robbed of the fruit of her successful struggle against Spanish despotism. Under Spain and under Papal domination, Protestantism had been rigidly excluded so that the new struggle for liberty, which was a struggle against the priests, appeared a struggle against religion itself. The only religion with which the Mexican patriot was familiar was a religion that tried to enslave him. Small wonder was it that the very name of religion became hateful to him. It was difficult to overcome his natural prejudice. He suspected interested motives in those who approached him on the subject of religion and believed that the Protestant was as much the enemy of his country as the Roman Catholic priest. To this day, the missionary is opposed not more violently by the priests, than he is by the patriots, who have been driven into indifference or atheism. Beside this there is a prejudice against Protestantism as a foreign Church. The proud, sensitive people resent missionaries being sent to them from other nations, as if they were an ignorant heathen people, and they are disposed to regard Americans especially with suspicion as being plotters for the annexation of their country to the United States. The Mexican wished to go on without interference or religious help of any kind. He had been deceived and had lost such faith as he had. Everywhere there was scepticism on the one hand and blind superstition on the other. All these obstacles make Mexico an extremely difficult and discouraging field, and Christ's servants there would have lost heart long ago, in carrying on the Gospel work, but for their strong faith in the power of their Master to overcome all obstacles. They have prayed to him for help and he has heard them. In spite of indifference and opposition the Gospel is winning its way among the people. Missionaries of the Methodist and Presbyterian Churches are at work and the corps of native evangelists laboring under Bishop H.C. Riley, whose headquarters are in the City of Mexico, are preaching the Gospel in the country districts. To cheer these noble, self-sacrificing laborers of all denominations was a good work and we are glad that Messrs. Moody and Sankey undertook it. How much of that kind of duty in addition to direct evangelical effort they have done in their own country, in England, Scotland and Ireland our readers know, and nowhere was it needed more than it was in Mexico.

SALVATION.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., preached last Sunday on the Text: Isaiah 55: 6 "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found."

ISAIAH stands head and shoulders above the other Old Testament authors in vivid descriptiveness of Christ. Other prophets give an outline of our Saviour's features. Some of them present, as it were, the side face of Christ; others a bust of Christ; but Isaiah gives us the full-length portrait of Christ. Other Scripture writers excel in some things. Ezekiel more weird, David more pathetic, Solomon more epigrammatic, Habakkuk more sublime; but when you want to see Christ coming out from the gates of prophecy in all his grandeur and glory, you involuntarily turn to Isaiah. So that if the prophecies in regard to Christ might be called the "Oratorio of the Messiah," the writing of Isaiah is the "Hallelujah Chorus," where all the batons wave and all the trumpets come in. Isaiah was not a man picked up out of insignificance by inspiration. He was known and honored. Josephus, and Philo, and Sirach extolled him in their writings. What Paul was among the apostles, Isaiah was among the prophets.

My text finds him standing on a mountain of inspiration, looking out into the future, beholding Christ advancing and anxious that all men might know him; his voice rings down the ages: "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found." "Oh," says some one, "that was for olden times." No, my hearer. If you have traveled in other lands you have taken a circular letter of credit from some banking-house in New York, and in St. Petersburg, or Venice, or Rome, or Melbourne, or Calcutta, you presented that letter and got financial help immediately. And I want you to understand that the text, instead of being appropriate for one age, or for one land, is a circular letter for all ages and for all lands, and wherever it is presented for help, the help comes: "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found."

I come, to-day, with no hair-spun theories of religion, with no nice distinctions, with no elaborate disquisition; but with an urgent call to personal religion. The Gospel of Christ is a powerful medicine: it either kills or cures. There are those who say, "I would like to become a Christian. I have been waiting a good while for the right kind of influences to come;" and still you are waiting. You are wiser in worldly things than you are in religious things. If you want to get to Albany, you go to the Grand Central Depot, or to the steamboat wharf, and, having got your ticket, you do not sit down on the wharf or sit in the depot [illegible] And yet there are men who say they are waiting to get to heaven—waiting, waiting, but not with intelligent waiting, or they would [illegible] that would bear them into the kingdom of God.

Now you know very well that to seek a thing is to search for it with earnest endeavor. If you want to see a certain man in this city, and there is a matter of $10,000 connected with your seeing him, and you cannot at first find him, you do not give up the search. You look in the directory, but cannot find the name; you go in circles where you think, perhaps, he may mingle, and, having found the part of the city where he lives, but perhaps not knowing the street, you go through street after street, and from block to block, and you keep on searching for weeks and for months.

You say: "It is a matter of $10,000 whether I see him or not." Oh, that men were as persistent in seeking for Christ! Had you one-half that persistence you would long ago have found him who is the joy of the forgiven spirit. We may pay our debts, we may attend church, we may relieve the poor, we may be public benefactors, and yet all our life disobey the text, never seek God, never gain heaven. Oh, that the Spirit of God would help me, while I try to show you, in carrying out the idea of my text, first, how to seek the Lord, and in the next place, when to seek him.

I remark, in the first place, you are to seek the Lord through earnest and believing prayer. God is not an autocrat or a despot seated on a throne, with his arms resting on brazen lions, and a sentinel pacing up and down at the foot of the throne. God is a father seated in a bower, waiting for his children to come and climb on his knee, and get his kiss and his benediction. Prayer is the cup with which we go to the "fountain of living water," and dip up refreshment for our thirsty soul. Grace does not come to the heart as we set a cask at the corner of the house to catch the rain in the shower. It is a pulley fastened to the throne of God, which we pull, bringing the blessing.

I do not care so much what posture you take in prayer, nor how large an amount of voice you use. You might get down on your face before God, if you did not pray right inwardly, there would be no response. You might cry at the top of your voice, and unless you had a believing spirit within, your cry would not go further up than the shout of a plow-boy to his oxen. Prayer must be believing, earnest, loving. You are in your house some summer day, and a shower comes up, and a bird, affrighted, darts into the window, and wheels about the room. You seize it. You smooth its ruffled plumage. You feel its fluttering heart. You say, "Poor thing, poor thing!" Now, a prayer goes out of the storm of this world into the window of God's mercy, and he catches it, and he feels its fluttering pulse, and he puts it in his own bosom of affection and safety. Prayer is a warm, ardent, pulsating exercise. It is an electric battery which, touched, thrills to the throne of God! It is the diving-bell in which we go down into the depths of God's mercy and bring up "pearls of great price." There was an instance where prayer made the waves of the Gennesaret solid as stone pavement. Oh, how many wonderful things prayer has accomplished! Have you ever tried it? In the days when the Scotch Covenanters were persecuted, and the enemies were after them, one of the head men among the Covenanters prayed: "Oh, Lord, we be as dead men unless thou shalt help us! Oh, Lord, throw the lap of thy cloak over these poor things!" And instantly a Scotch mist enveloped and hid the persecuted from their persecutors—the promise literally fulfilled: "While they are yet speaking I will hear."

Have you ever tried the power of prayer? God says: "He is loving, and faithful, and patient." Do you believe that? You are told that Christ came to save sinners. Do you believe that? You are told that all you have to do to get the pardon of the Gospel is to ask for it. Do you believe that? Then come to him and say: "Oh, Lord! I know thou canst not lie. Thou hast told me to come for pardon, and I could get it. I come, Lord. Keep thy promise, and liberate my captive soul."

Oh, that you might have an altar in the parlor, in the kitchen, in the store, in the barn, for Christ will be willing to come again to the manger to hear prayer. He would come to your place of business, as he confronted Matthew, the tax commissioner. If a measure should come before Congress that you thought would ruin the nation, how you would send in petitions and remonstrances! And yet there has been enough sin in your heart to ruin it forever, and you have never remonstrated or petitioned against it. If your physical health failed, and you had the means, you would go and spend the summer in Germany, and the winter in Italy, and you would think it a very cheap outlay if you had to go all round the earth to get back your physical health. Have you make any effort, any expenditure, any exertion for your immortal and spiritual health?

Oh that you might now begin to seek after God with earnest prayer. Some of you have been working for years and years for the support of your families. Have you given one half day to the working out of your salvation with fear and trembling? You came here with an earnest purpose, I take it, as I have come hither with an earnest purpose, and we meet face to face, and I tell you, first of all, if you want to find the Lord, you must pray, and pray and pray.

I remark again, you must seek the Lord through Bible study. The Bible is the newest book in the world. "Oh," you say, "it was made hundreds of years ago, and the learned men of King James translated it hundreds of years ago." I confute that idea by telling you it is not five minutes old, when God, by his blessed Spirit, retranslates it into the heart. If you will, in the seeking of the way of life through Scripture study, implore God's light to fall upon the page, you will find that these promises are not one second old, and that they drop straight from the throne of God into your heart.

There are many people to whom the Bible does not amount to much. If they merely look at the outside beauty, why it will no more lead them to Christ than Washington's farewell address or the Koran of Mohammed, or the Shaster of the Hindoos. It is the inward light of God's Word you must get. I went up to the church of the Madeleine, in Paris, and looked at the doors which were the most wonderfully constructed I ever saw, and I could have stayed there for a whole week; but I had only a little time, so having glanced at the wonderful carving on the doors, I passed in and looked at the radiant altars, and the sculptured dome. Alas, that so many stop at the outside door of God's Holy Word, looking at the rhetorical beauties, instead of going in and looking at the altars of sacrifice and the dome of God's mercy and salvation that hovers over penitent and believing souls!

O my friends! if you merely want to study the laws of language, do not go to the Bible. It was not made for that. Take "Howe's Elements of Criticism"—it will be better than the Bible for that. If you want to study metaphysics, better than the Bible will be the writings of William Hamilton. But if you want to know how to have sin pardoned, and at last to gain the blessedness of heaven, search the Scriptures, "for in them ye have eternal life."

When people are anxious about their souls, there are those who recommend good books. That is all right. But I want to tell you that the Bible is the best book under such circumstances. Baxter wrote "A Call to the Unconverted," but the Bible is the best call to the unconverted. Philip Doddridge wrote "The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," but the Bible is the best rise and progress. John Angell James wrote "Advice to the Anxious Inquirer," but the Bible is the best advice to the anxious inquirer.

O, the Bible is the very book you need, anxious and inquiring soul! A dying soldier said to his mate: "Comrade, give me a drop!" The comrade shook up the canteen, and said: "There isn't a drop of water in the canteen." "Oh," said the dying soldier, "that's not what I want; I have in my knapsack for my Bible," and his comrade found the Bible, and read him a few of the gracious promises, and the dying soldier said: "Ah, that's what I want. There isn't anything like the Bible for a dying soldier, is there, my comrade?" O blessed book while we live! Blessed book when we die!

I remark, again, we must seek God through church ordinances. "What," say you, "can't a man be saved without going to church?" I reply, there are men, I suppose, in glory, who have never seen a church; but the church is the ordained means by which we are to be brought to God; and if truth affects us when we are alone, it affects us more mightily when we are in the assembly—the feelings of others emphasizing our own feelings. The great law of sympathy comes into play, and a truth that would take hold only with the grasp of a sick man, beats mightily against the soul with a thousand heart-throbs.

When you come into the religious circle, come only with one notion, and only for one purpose—to find the way to Christ. When I see people critical about sermons, and critical about tones of voice, and critical about sermonic delivery, they make me think of a man in prison. He is condemned to death, but an officer of the government brings a pardon and puts it through the wicket of the prison, and says: "Here is your pardon. Come and get it." "What! Do you expect me to take that pardon offered with such a voice as you have, with such an awkward manner as you have? I would rather die than so compromise my rhetorical notions!" Ah, the man does not say that; he takes it! It is his life. He does not care how it is handed to him. And if, to-day, that pardon from the throne of God is offered to our souls, shall we not seize it, regardless of all non-essentials?

But I come now to the last part of my text. It tells us when we are to seek the Lord: "While he may be found." When is that? Old age? You may not see old age. To-morrow? You may not see to-morrow. To-night? You may not see to-night. Now! O, if I could only write on every heart, in three capital letters, that word N-O-W—Now!

Sin is an awful disease. I hear people say with a toss of the head and with artificial manner: "Oh, yes, I'm a sinner." Sin is an awful disease. It is leprosy. It is dropsy. It is consumption. It is all fatal disorders in one. Now you know there is a crisis in a disease. Perhaps you have had some illustration of it in your family. Sometimes the physician has called, and he has looked at the patient and said: "That case was simple enough; but the crisis has passed. If you had called me yesterday or this morning, I could have cured the patient. It is too late now; the crisis has passed." Just so it is in the spiritual treatment of the soul—there is a crisis.

There are some here who can remember instances in life when, if they had bought a certain property, they would have been very rich. A few acres that would not cost them almost nothing were offered them. They refused them. Afterward a large village or city sprung up on those acres of ground, and they see what a mistake they made in not buying the property. There was an opportunity of getting it. It [illegible] ca back again. And so it is in regard to man's spiritual and eternal fortune. Th is a chance; if you let that go, perha it never comes back. Certainly, that on never comes back.

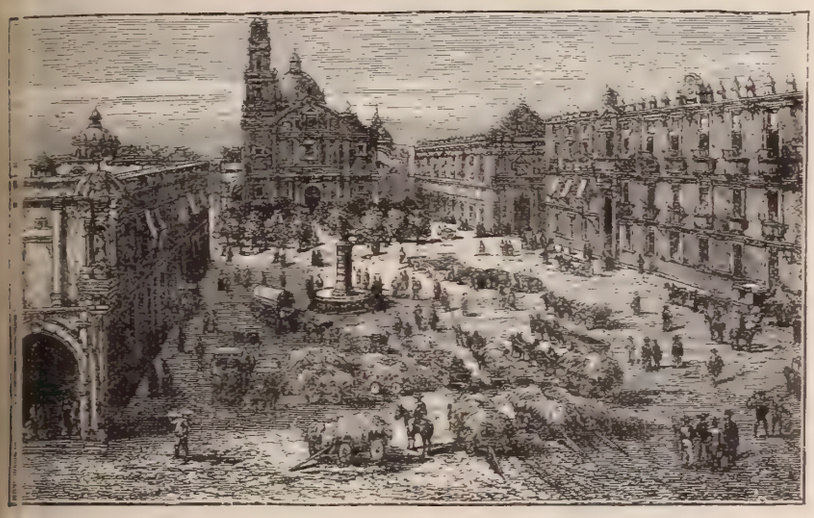
gentleman told me that at the battle of Gettysburg he stood upon a height looking off upon the conflicting armies. He said it wa the most exciting moment of his life; no one army seeming to triumph, and no the other. After awhile the host wheeled in ch a way that he knew in five minutes th whole question would be decided. He sa the emotion was almost unbearable.

The diamond districts of Brazil are carefully guarded, and a man does not get in there except by a pass from the government; but the love of Christ is a diamond district we may all enter, and pick up treasures for eternity. "To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts."

Take the hint of the text that I have no time to dwell upon—the hint that there is a time when he cannot be found. There was a man in this city, eighty years of age, who said to a clergyman who came in, "Do you think that a man eighty years of age can get pardoned?" "Oh, yes," said the clergyman. The old man said: "I can't; when I was twenty years of age—I am now eighty years—the Spirit of God came to my soul, and I felt the importance of attending to these things, but I put it off. I rejected God, and since then I have had no feeling." "Well," said the minister, "wouldn't you like to have me pray with you?" "Yes," replied the old man, "but it will do no good. You can pray with me if you like to." The minister knelt down and prayed, and commended the man's soul to God. It seemed to have no effect upon him. After awhile the last hour of the man's life came, and through his delirium a spark of intelligence seemed to flash, and with his last breath he said, "I shall never be forgiven!" "O seek the Lord while he may be found."



THE OLD INQUISITION BUILDING IN MEXICO.

Th is just such a time to-day with you. Th forces of light on one side, the forces of ath on the other side, and in a few mo ts the matter will be settled for eternity. here is a time which mercy has set for leaving port. If you are on board before th you will get a passage for heaven. If you are not on board, you miss your passage for heaven. As in law courts, a case is sometimes adjourned from term to term, and from year to year, till the bill of costs eats up the entire estate, so there are men wh are adjourning the matter of religion fro time to time, and from year to year, un heavenly bliss is the bill of costs the m will have to pay for it.

hy defer this matter, oh, my dear hearer Have you any idea that sin will wear ou that it will evaporate? that it will relax its grasp? that you may find religion as a man accidentally finds a lost pocket-book? Al no! No man ever became a Christian by accident, or by the relaxing of sin. Th embarrassments are all the time increasing. The hosts of darkness are recruiting, and the longer you postpone this matter the steeper the path will become. I ask those men who are before me now, wh her in the ten or fifteen years they have paused in the postponement of these matters they have come any nearer God or heaven? I would not be afraid to challenge this whole audience, so far as they ma not have found the peace of the Gospel in regard to the matter. Your hearts, you are willing frankly to tell me, are becoming harder and harder, and that if you co to Christ it will be more of an undertaking now than it ever would have been before. The throne of judgment will soon be set; and, if you have anything to do toward your eternal salvation, you had better do now, for the redemption of your soul is precious, and it ceaseth forever.

h, if men could only catch one glimpse of Christ, I know they would love him! Yo heart leaps at the sight of a glorious sunrise or sunset. Can you be without emotion as the Sun of Righteousness rises behind Calvary, and sets behind Joseph's sepulchre? He is a blessed Saviour! Every nation has its type of beauty. There is German beauty, and Swiss beauty, and Italian beauty, and English beauty; but I care not in what land a man first looks at Christ, he pronounces him "chief among ten thousand, and the One altogether lovely."

Chapultepec, is in one of the most beautiful localities in the country. Built on the top of a high rock, it is surrounded by venerable trees, and the adjacent country has the aspect of a splendid tropical garden. From the marble terraces of the palace can be seen one of the finest views in the world. Chapultepec (the word means "Grasshopper Hill") is reached by two roads from the City of Mexico. It is a volcanic elevation 1625 feet long and 100 in height, covered with luxurious vegetation and crowned with groves of cypress, some of the trees being of great age.

Stretching far away are seen noble forests of oak, sycamore and cedar, whilst beyond, cultivated fields, beautiful gardens, lakes and lagoons girdle the valley around. Looking toward Mexico, the spectator has behind him the low chain of Las Cruces: on his right, to the south, Pedregal and the Ajuscean Hills; before him to the east, the grand, snowy tops of Popocatepetl, the Hill of Smoke, and Iztaccihuatl, "White Woman," so-called from its bright robe of snow; on his left, to the north, Cerro Gordo, and nearer the Sierra Guadaloupe, where stands the most celebrated church of Mexico, dedicated to the Virgin.

Porfirio Diaz, President of Mexico (whose portrait appears on this page) is now in his 66th year. He has several times been re-elected President of the Republic. In politics, he is extremely liberal and under his administration, the sway of Romish priest-craft has received a severe check. He is tolerant in all matters affecting religious freedom, however, and Protestantism has progressed in Mexico under his rule, although no more consideration has been extended to it than to any other form of faith or public worship. At different times, President Diaz has distinguished himself in a way that has endeared him to the people of Mexico, and more than once he has led their armies successfully when the republic was menaced by those who were plotting for personal power. Public prosperity, official economy and comparative peace have attended his beneficent rule. In private life he is simple and unassuming.

Not the least interesting of our illustrations is that showing the old Inquisition Building in the City of Mexico. What hallowed yet sorrowful memories linger around that fateful pile, every stone of which has been steeped in sacrifice! Within its quadrangle is holy ground, where martyrs have suffered and died. They passed away at the stake, and under various tortures, by the thousand, during the long period in which the Inquisition was permitted to exist. The building is over 320 years old. The "brasero," or burning-place was a short distance eastward of the church of San Diego, and was a square platform, with wall and terrace arranged for the erection of stakes to which the condemned were fastened—the whole being at an elevation that could be seen by almost the entire city.

A HEATHEN'S REBUKE.

At a recent missionary meeting in England, a Hottentot convert said: "What a pity it is, what a sin it is, that you have so many years got that heavenly bread and hold it for yourselves, not to give one little bit, one crumb, to poor heathen. There are so many millions of heathen, and you have so much bread; and you could depend upon it you should not have less because you gave, but the Lord Jesus would give his blessing, and you should have the more."

Two of our illustrations present types of peasant life in the Southern Republic. The poor charcoal-burner (a peon or half-breed) represents a very large class of Mexicans who are slowly emerging from a condition of ignorance and practical slavery, for a peon even yet is little better off than a slave. Indeed, throughout South America, a peon is usually a bondman, who is held in servitude under some claim of debt or other obligation. In the rural districts, on large plantations, the Indian farm-hands are treated as part of the owner's possessions, yet kindly and often generously. After a banquet they gather in front of the house. The hostess serves the food indoors to the guests meanwhile. By-and-by the manager of the plantation (the administrador), calls the names of the peons and the number of their children, the ration being a large wooden spoonful of meat with one of beans and a piece of bread for each member of the family. When all the laborers are served the beggars receive their share, no one being turned away.

PORFIRIO DIAZ, PRESIDENT OF MEXICO.

Previous to 1867, religious liberty was unknown in Mexico. From the very beginning of the Spanish conquest, the religion of the country had been a mixture of heathenism and Romanism. Fully one-third of the property of the State had come into the possession of the hierarchy. Under the new regime a large portion of the Church property was confiscated, the Jesuits were banished, and the Bible, which had been strictly kept from the people, was permitted to be circulated and read. But even now, after the lapse of nearly thirty years, so deeply-rooted was the religious intolerance, that there are many parts of Mexico where the priest-hood still exerts an influence hostile to progress and enlightenment in spiritual things, and in bitter opposition to all Protestant missions and American influence.

One of the earliest American missionary efforts in Mexico was undertaken by a godly woman, Miss Matilda Rankin, who in 1866 established a school in Monterey, in connection with her work as a Bible distributor. In those days, the Word had to be read in secret, to avoid persecution, and the first Protestant churches were organized quietly and privately by little companies of believers, one of their own number usually conducting the services and administering the sacraments. Soon thereafter, the American Bible Society put its distributors in the field, and the Word received a cordial welcome in many Mexican homes. There are now upwards of one hundred and fifty Protestant missionaries in the country, 360 native laborers, 400 congregations, and over 6000 Sunday School pupils.

JESUS BEFORE THE HIGH PRIEST.

S. S. Lesson for May 12. Mark 14: 53-64. Golden Text Isa. 53: 3. By Mrs. Baxter.

CALL through his life our Lord was not only our Saviour and holy Sin-offering, but always also our forerunner and example. We, too, have first our conquests through faith before we learn to conquer by submitting. This is also conquest by faith, but it is a faith according to knowledge, which enters intimately into God's purposes. The ministry of our Lord when he "went about doing good and healing all that were possessed of the devil" was at an end. Instead of multitudes following him, hanging upon his lips or waiting for his healing touch, he was now treading the winepress alone, and of the people there was none with him (Isa. 63: 3), even his chosen twelve had forsaken him and fled. And yet at such a moment, one with his Father's purpose, for the joy set before him he endured the cross despising the shame! (Heb. 13: 3.) The awful moment of uncertainty in Gethsemane was past; He knew now, from Scripture, the ground he was treading, and was at home in the hands of the emissaries of the high priest who were sent to take him, for himself had foretold to his disciples: "The Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders, and chief priests, and the scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again. (Mark 8: 31, R.V.) Whatever the Father had permitted to be written of him, he came to fulfil.

Already, while the disciples were still following him, he had rebuked Peter's zeal in defending him, and healed the ear of the high priest's servant which his rash disciple had cut off, and said: "Put up again thy sword into its place, for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword. Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels? But how then shall that thus it must be?" (Matt. 26: 53, 54.) He who in Gethsemane had appealed to his Father to save him from death through exhaustion, in order that he might not die a death which could not fulfil the Scripture regarding him (Isa. 53: 10-12), now when an appeal to his Father would prevent the fulfilling of the Scriptures, forbore to ask for deliverance, which was within his reach. In that same hour said Jesus to the multitude: "Are ye come out as against a thief with swords and staves for to take me? I sat daily with you teaching in the temple and ye laid no hold on me. But all this was done that the Scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled." (Matt. 26: 55, 56). It was his vocation to fulfil. (Matt. 5: 17.)

"And they led Jesus away to the high priest," little knowing how they, too, were fulfilling the Scriptures in condemning him (Acts 13: 27). Jesus was alone, but the cause against him was popular among the priests: he was the greatest obstacle to their influence and power, and all the chief priests and elders of the people and the scribes were banded together as one man "against the Lord and against his Christ," confirming by their very action the testimony of the second Psalm, that Jesus was the Christ, God's King whom he would set upon his holy hill of Zion. But the high priest had undertaken a task of no little difficulty when he sought to [illegible] Jesus should be condemned. It is usual when a malefactor is apprehended to have at least a warrant-able [illegible] before a warrant for his arrest is issued. But so eager were the enemies of Jesus to get rid of the Son of God, that they caused his arrest first and then sought for some justifiable pretext for their action. They sought for witness against Jesus but found none. False witnesses were to be had, perhaps hired, but their testimony spoke for itself, "their witness agreed not together." Had it been true it could not have been contradictory. At last they raked up the story, "We heard him say: I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and in three days will I build another without hands." So ran the indictment. "And not even so did their witness agree together." (R.V.) And no wonder; the words they wrested were these: "Destroy this temple," i. e., you Jews destroy this temple of my body, "and in three days I will raise it up."

Now, however, his enemies thought they had something to lay hold of. The high priest, unlike the usual custom of a judge, left his seat, so eager was he to condemn the faultless Man before him. The real, great High Priest of mankind stood there arraigned before him. Caiphas had been wont, on the day of atonement, to bear upon his heart in the breastplate and in the stones on his shoulders the names of the children of Israel, his office was to bear those names "before the Lord continually." (Exod. 28: 9-29.) But there was little indeed of the spirit of intercession in this man, Caiaphas, who hated and persecuted the Son of God. Not for his people, but for his selfish envy and pride of office, was he so bent upon the destruction of Jesus. And his Prisoner? The breastplate which had been a figure and shadow of heavenly things, was but a poor type of that which lay, in deep reality, on the heart of God's high Priest who continueth ever. (Hebrew 7: 24.) Not only the children of Israel, but every man—for he tasted death for every man—did Jesus Christ bear on his priestly heart in that time of offering up himself.

"Answereth Thou Nothing?"

asked the earthly high priest of his unknown Antitype. "What is it which these witness against thee?" But he held his peace and answered nothing. O the mighty power of silence! O the conquest achieved by answering not a word! It had been prophesied of him: "He was oppressed, yet he humbled himself and opened not his mouth; as a lamb that is led to the slaughter, and as a sheep that before her shearers is dumb; yea, he opened not his mouth. (Isa. 53: 7, R.V.) He was a witness as him in whom the whole human race is headed up, and indeed, he who dared to be our Representative; the Unfallen for the fallen, the Just for the unjust—that all flesh is grass and all the goodliness thereof as the flowers of the field. For himself, as the last Adam, for man as man, he had not a word to plead. Death should do what life could not do. All his holy life, all his miracles, failed to deliver man from death and utter destruction. He had no personal cause. He was a Sacrifice; his death and his resurrection should give the answers to the high priest. By dying he should conquer death. And in this he is not only our holy, blessed, sufficient Sacrifice, but also our Example. In our home life, we cannot escape wrong by resisting it, and by asserting ourselves. The strongest weapon we have is submission. To be the strongest in an argument does not touch the heart of an opponent; to overcome by force of will, or strength of character, only brings about separation. But to be silent under injury, the lamb "which openeth not her mouth," disarms those who would injure us: it appeals to them in a way they cannot get rid of; Christ as the Lamb slain, not as the Lion of the tribe of Judah, has overcome sin, death, sorrow.

"He trusted in God,"

the sneering taunt of the chief priests was nevertheless the expression of the sum total of the life of Jesus; he saw his Father's hand in everything, and bowed to his wisdom and his will. "Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight." (Matt. 11: 26) was always sufficient reason for our Lord. Should it not be so for his disciples also? If it is right with God, can we grumble, murmur or resist? The cup which my heavenly Father hath given me shall I not drink it (John 18: 2) said our Lord: shall we not take every cup from his hand, and, recognizing him in it, shall we not yield? When God and we are on the same side, who can be against us? Things may not turn out as we, in our short-sightedness, have imagined, hoped, or even prayed, but God's eternal purpose, which is infinitely greater, will be carried out, and we having suffered with him, shall also reign with him. We can afford, when we see things in the light of God, to accept the greatest misunderstanding, the greatest unkindness, from man as God's instrument, to exercise our faith without one shade of injured feeling against the instrument through whom the trial comes.

THE JEWISH HIGH PRIEST.

OUR Lord appears to have recovered his composure after the mental struggle, considered last week. He calmly met the officers who were sent to arrest him, knowing well the purpose for which they had come. He had no reproaches even for Judas, whose kiss was an insult that it must have been hard to bear. Jesus asks that his disciples be not arrested, and then quietly submits to be bound. That he felt the indignity keenly, is obvious from his protest against being treated as a thief. (Matt. 26: 55.) But he would not resist. His miraculous powers had not diminished, as he proved by the healing of one of the band, whose ear the angry, impulsive Peter struck off with his sword; yet he would not use them to protect himself. Why he decided to let his enemies have their way then, instead of escaping from them, as he did at Nazareth, and so continuing his ministry another year or two, we are not told. Sooner or later they would kill him and apparently he believed that this was the time for him to die. From this time to the end, there is no sign of reluctance or wish to avoid the doom the Council had pronounced against him. On their side, they were determined to get him out of the way and it only remained to give their proceedings as legal a form as possible. Some pretext must be found for his execution, for these men held official position and could not afford to commit or authorize assassination. Jesus was conducted under guard from the Garden back to the city, Peter and John slinking after him at a distance and the other disciples going into hiding. The four accounts, at this point become somewhat confused, as was natural in men who were no longer eyewitnesses of what they relate. The differences however, are only in minor details. It would appear that Jesus was taken first to Annas, who had held the office of high-priest, but had been deposed by the Romans. The object of arraigning Jesus before him is not stated, but it is probable that the Jews did not regard his deposition from office as binding, and regarding him as the rightful high-priest, desired to have his endorsement of the proceedings. We may infer that the examination by Annas was short, and the cords on the prisoner's wrists being replaced, as a sign of the judgment of Annas, he was taken before Caiaphas, who was [illegible] actual high-priest. It was contrary to [illegible] law for the Sanhedrim to hold court at night to try a man for his life, but a number of the members were hastily summoned from their beds and informed that Christ had been arrested. It was an informal meeting to decide on the charge that should form the pretext for condemnation. Witnesses were sent for, but though they seem to have been willing to earn their fee by false evidence, there was nothing on which a capital charge could be based. The only technical charge was that of bringing the Temple into contempt, but even on that the evidence was weak. Two men must agree in their evidence before a capital charge could be substantiated. The high priest was impatient; it seemed as if after all their trouble the prisoner might escape conviction. Seeing him standing so meek and quiet before the court, the high-priest determined to challenge him, so as to convict him out of his own mouth. The plan succeeded. Jesus avowed himself the Messiah, and Caiaphas in affected horror declared the avowal blasphemy and was supported by the court. There was no dissenting voice, and the council separated to meet again at dawn to ratify the decision.

Answerest thou nothing? Caiaphas was amazed that Jesus did not reply to the charges made against him. Sometimes it is difficult to follow Christ in this course of silent forbearance. A little girl came home from school one day with her face swollen and her eyes red with weeping. "What has troubled my little daughter?" asked the mother. The tears began to fall again fast, last it appeared that the other children had called her "Tow-head," and had said untrue things about her. The child was distressed and indignant. The mother read the New Testament and read the story of this trial of Christ's patience. "Do you think, mamma, that they called him names and told falsehoods about him?" asked the child. "Many bore false witness against him," read the mother, "and his judge called him a blasphemer." The child thought a moment, and said, "I think I ought to bear it then." Many Christians have come to the same conclusion.

Followed him afar off. Peter did not want the people to identify him with Christ. There was disgrace in it, and perhaps danger. There have been many who have been tempted to do likewise, but some, by the grace of God, have had courage to declare themselves Christ's followers when such a declaration involved peril. A great many years ago a Roman emperor said to a Greek architect, "Build me a Coliseum, and when it is done I will make your name famous through all the world." The work was done, and a great host was gathered in the Coliseum to dedicate it. And then they brought out some Christians who were ready to die for the truth, and the emperor said, "The Coliseum is done, and we have come to celebrate it to-day by the putting to death of Christians, and we have come here to honor the architect." Whereupon the Greek architect sprang to his feet and shouted, "I also am a Christian." And they flung him to the wild beasts.

Their witness agreed not together. So it is to this day with the witnesses against Christ and Christianity. Scientific opponents do not agree together nor do those who oppose on social or philosophical grounds. It sometimes happens that the [illegible] not even agree with themselves. An infidel named Barker was declaiming in Philadelphia in the hearing of a Quaker. The infidel said, in the course of his address, that all preachers were hypocrites and did not believe in the doctrines they preached. "Let me ask thee a question," said the Quaker. "You were a preacher some years ago, did you preach what you did not believe? Were you a hypocrite?" The infidel evaded answering and the Quaker continued: "If thou wast sincere when thou wast a preacher there must have been at least one preacher who was not a hypocrite, so thou must be lying now. If thou wast a hypocrite then thou mayest be one now. That is a dilemma, friend Barker." The audience agreed and the infidel was laughed into silence. Another practical proof of inconsistency was furnished by Col. Allen, a notorious infidel in Connecticut, whose daughter being stricken with an incurable disease from which she must soon die, asked him if he would advise her to follow his teaching or that of her Christian mother. The Colonel was much agitated and was silent a moment. Then he said, "Follow your mother, my child."

A Young Teacher.

I WAS very busy that day about my work, for I had it all to do myself. Help was not to be had easily in our town, then, and even if it could have been got for the asking, Will and I had no money to spare. We sailed close to the wind.

"But you need not pity me, Caroline, I have lived, as you know, in a big house since those early days, and kept my carriage, and I've known what it is to have a full purse, as well as I once knew the meaning of an empty one. I never in my whole life, Caroline, enjoyed myself more than when I was a young wife, with my good man going whistling off to the shop in the morning, and coming back at night, tired to be sure, but glad and happy, and sleeping briskly out all day, keeping the whole little place tidy, and fairly shining with cleanliness, and the meals on the table of my own cooking. Good cooking, too."

Mrs. Dalrymple paused for breath, and Miss Caroline Hastings nodded her appreciation of her friend's sentiments, till the flowers on her black lace cap fairly danced. The two old ladies did not mind me. I was not supposed ever to hear anything when I had a book or a pen in my hand, and nobody noticed me.

Mrs. Dalrymple was short and stout, with merry black eyes, and hair, at eighty, without a streak of gray. Miss Hastings was little and withered looking, a sort of fact rose effect in her delicate thin face and slender hands. She was past sixty, but we called her still one of the Hastings girls. Both women were lovely and good, and in their speech, and on their dear old brows, one could discern the mark of the Lord. To both of them he had given the sweet assurance, "Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty," and the glow of expectancy was in their sweet serenity, while they waited for his summons. Dear old ladies both, and love them.

"Well, Caroline," Mrs. Dalrymple continued, "I was very busy that day. The twins were both quite cross, just recovering from the measles; my sister's little Susy and Jamie were with me, for they had had the measles, and there was scarlet fever in the neighborhood, and Artie was a teething baby. So my hands were full. I was folding down the table-cloths for ironing when I heard a soft 'fraid sort of knock at the front door, and I went to open it.

"There stood Katharine, a girl of thirteen or thereabouts, with rosy cheeks, and a firm little mouth, and smooth, brown hair. I took all those points in as I waited for her to speak and tell her business. She had on a plain gingham frock that reached to her shoe-tops, and her hat was of brown lawn, shirred over a frame, with a wide, flaring brim.

"'If you please,' said my little lady, 'are you Mrs. Dalrymple?' Very modest and prettily spoken she was.

"'Yes,' said I, 'I am she, my dear.'

"'Well, then, perhaps I may be of use to you. I'm trying to get something to do, and mamma said I might see if I could raise a little class among the neighbors. I won't charge much.'

"'But, my dear, you are only a child,' I said in surprise.

"'Oh, no! I'm much older than I look. I'm nearly fifteen,' she replied, drawing herself up.

"'And I have only babies.' (It was before kindergartens had been heard of.)

"'Little darlings,' exclaimed Missy, spying the twins. 'I could play with them for you, and teach them hymns and texts, and their a, b, c's.'

"'What would you charge?' I asked.

"'Ten cents a week,' she said promptly, "for the tiny ones, and twenty cents for any bigger children, and I can teach sewing and embroidery, too. I've had lessons myself.'

"Well, you'd hardly believe me, but that little girl won me right over. Her mother only lived a few doors off. They had lately moved there; her father was an old gentleman and very feeble. Katharine was a bright scholar, and the oldest of four, and there was very little to come and go on. She had hit on the plan herself, in the hope to assist her mother and father, and it shows what a girl can do if she tries. That little teacher began a school which is going on to this day. She kept it herself till she married, then she sold the good-will of it, and from hand to hand it passed along, and I've a little great-granddaughter at it now.

"The best of it is," said Mrs. Dalrymple, musingly, "it's never lost its religious character. First time I went after my twins, it just broke me all up. There was Miss Katharine standing up and leading the bairns in the Lord's Prayer; then she began a hymn, and then, when they sang it, for she had children up to twelve in her school, and kept them in wonderful order, she told them a Bible story."

"And what became of her finally," inquired Miss Hastings. "Did she die?"

"Not at all," said Mrs. Dalrymple. "She's living yet, a minister's wife, and doing her duty nobly. She's written two or three books, and some lovely poetry, and she's as bright and cheery an old lady as you can well imagine, with a granddaughter as pretty as a picture, just as she was when she started out boldly for herself with a child's faith in the dear Lord."

I rose and moved softly out of the room, for I knew Katharine. She has been my life-long friend. A brave child, a brave woman, a useful Christian.

BEAUTIFUL FLOWERS.

BUDDING and blooming all over the land,
Teeming with beauty they come from God's hand;
Faithful, they yield him their fragrance so grand.
Beautiful! Beautiful flowers!

Nature's heart opens to give them a place,
Kissed by the sunshine, they smile in sweet grace;
Nothing but blessings they bring to our race.
Beautiful! Beautiful flowers!

Though born so lowly, with home near the ground,
Pure and untarnished, they ever are found;
Heaven's rich splendor within them abounds.
Beautiful! Beautiful flowers!

Blest boon from heaven, to our sin-curs't earth,
Holy their mission, their life, and their birth;
Mutely they speak their "Great Maker's" praise forth.
Beautiful! Beautiful flowers!

O'er vales and meadows, or in flowery lea,
Huts by the wayside their rich glory see,
While homes palatial give welcome to thee.
Beautiful! Beautiful flowers!

Love owns their sceptre on glad nuptial day,
Palaces claim them for royal display;
Saintly courts hail them, on Zion's blest way.
Beautiful! Beautiful flowers!

Cheering hearts desolate by their sweet bloom,
Soothing poor invalids in the sick-room;
Shedding bright radiance over death's gloom.
Beautiful! Beautiful flowers!

Perchance their presence is known there on high,
With saints and angels in realms of the sky;
Fadelessly blooming as ages roll by.
Beautiful! Beautiful flowers!

At Endor.

A Lonely Village on Hermon which, at Different Times, Played a Prominent Part in Hebrew History.

NESTLING on the northern slope of "Jebel Duhey" (the "Little Hermon" of travelers), is a village which presents the appearance of a place deserted. Once a settlement of considerable size, as is evident from the present extent of its buildings, most of which are little better than ruins, it is now of so little consequence as to be almost forgotten by the world. The rock of the mountain on whose slope it lies is hollowed out into caves, one of which—containing a small fountain, and with a narrow entrance, partially concealed by vines and rugged rocks—local tradition points out as the scene of Saul's interview with the woman possessed of a familiar spirit, who summoned for him the shade of Samuel.

The name of Endor, "the Fountain of Dor," is preserved in Jewish history in connection with the great victory of Deborah and Barak over Sisera and Jabin. Here, as tradition asserts, occurred the climax of their triumph in the death of the two chiefs, and it was possibly with some hope that a visit to a locality of such fortunate omen might aid him in his approaching crisis, that Saul came thither. Early Christian writers describe Endor as a considerable village. Little mention is made of it by later writers. The distance from Endor to Gilboa is between seven and eight miles, over rough ground. Originally it belonged to the Philistines, and after the conquest of their territory, it was assigned to Manasseh.

Some writers mention another village of the same name as having existed in the early centuries after Christ, and lying a few miles south of Mount Tabor. The village on the slope of Hermon, however (which is show in our illustration), is generally accepted as the true site of the Endor of the time of Saul, Israel's ill-fated king.

RUINS OF THE VILLAGE OF ENDOR, PALESTINE.

FLEET OF THE PHARAOHS.

Two remarkable archæological discoveries are reported from Egypt. At the ruins of Sakkara, on the Nile, De Morgan's latest excavations have been attended with unexpected success. He has discovered a buried fleet of the old Empire, with masts, sails, and rigging complete. One of the ships measures thirty-nine meters in length. At a spot eight miles from the Red Sea, near Suez, a trench recently cut on the site of an old temple revealed remains of a people who probably came into Egypt from the East to explore an unknown land, long before the days of the Pharaohs of the first dynasty. The lowest monuments were oblong blocks of stone, with a cut or score half an inch deep down the front and back of one end to mark legs, and two on each side of the other end to mark where the arms were. Clay images of a very primitive type were found, on the top of which were remains of a higher civilization, indicated by the finely sculptured images brought to light. They are soon to be sent to England, and will be placed on exhibition in London.

DON'T FRET.

HOW much room yet for reformatory and Christian work in all our land! Foreign heathenism is added to our genuine American heathenism, and there is an infinite work to be done at our own doors. We have more schools for vice than we have schools for virtue. Our cities are malodorous with drunkeries, and the distilleries send up the smoke of their torment forever and ever. The long story of crime and outrage in all parts of the land will go on until you, somehow, cage this wild beast of the rum traffic. You might as well go out with a bucket at New Orleans to bail out the Mississippi, forgetting that as long as the Ohio, and the Missouri, and the Arkansas, and the Yazoo, and eight mighty tributaries pour into it, nothing less than Omnipotence can halt that river. Neither can this great Mississippi of crime and outrage be bailed out as long as these one hundred thousand tributaries of iniquity keep pouring in their surges of death. In this great conflict, sometimes Christian men and philanthropists get thoroughly discouraged, and you hear the disheartenment in their prayers, and exhortations, and sermons. In such a mood you are of no use. A soldier who does not expect to win the day, might better be outside of the regiment. I suggest a healthful thing for you to do. When a long and severe winter is raging, it is most refreshing to go into some art gallery and look at a picture of spring-time, and see the blossoms; or at a picture of summer, and see the golden and green fields; or at a picture of autumn, and see the ripe orchards. So, if you ever get depressed at the long winter of the world's sin and sorrow, just open your Bible, and see the picture of spring, or summer, or autumn of what the world is yet to be, beyond all possibility of dispute. There is no more doubt about it than that June, and July, and August are soon to follow this inclement weather. So, while I work as hard as I can to make the world better, I have not fretted a half minute concerning its condition in twenty years; nor will I fret. I sympathize and weep with its woes, but fret about it I dare not. That would imply that I have lost confidence in God's capacity to manage his own world. That would imply that the world is on the way to catastrophe, instead of on the way to millennium. Isaiah describes that coming joy when he turns into the same pasture-field leopard and wolf, and bear and lion, and cow and calf. He turns the den of reptiles into a child's play-ground, and the desert becomes a blooming park. Jeremiah and Isaiah, and Malachi, and Paul, and John, and Christ join voices in presenting the brightness and grandeur, and redolence of the world as it shall be. Toward that consummation toil ye with uplifted head, and illuminated face, and exultant soul; for God will give all who are faithful a share in the final triumph. Every kind word spoken; every prayer offered; every good deed done, whether recognized or unknown, will give you more and more part in the joy of the great harvest home. Christ will push aside many a pretentious worker who won wide applause, to greet some humble disciple with the words, "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it to me." The trouble is that in religion we deal too much in glittering generalities, and do not realize that the most of this work is to be done on a small scale. Do the work next to you. Be satisfied to cultivate your own field. Many a man who had but one talent, and rightly used it, will in the last day receive higher reward than the man with five talents, or ten, who did not rightly employ them. Not great philanthropists, and great orators, and great officials are to save the world. The universal conquest will be the aggregation of the work of several hundred million of good men and women.

AS IT SHALL BE.

"THERE shall be no more sea," said the Apocalyptic trumpet. "There shall be no more sea," echo modern inventions. This bringing together of nations is hastening millennial times. The world is too big a place to be put under one government until the ocean is practically abolished. When Jesus begins his reign, all nations will be within instant call, and within swiftest transportation. The nineteenth century has only nibbled along the edges of discovery. The twentieth will unroll discoveries and inventions that will utterly eclipse their predecessors. The next century will be as far ahead of this as this century is ahead of the last. What a world this will be to live in in the year 1995! What with improved climate, and improved transportation, and improved morals, the obliteration of distances, and universal Gospelization, I would want to be here then, but for the fact that we shall be in a place better than anything this world can ever experience. People dying in those times will only go from Paradise to Paradise, and earth will be an annex of heaven. Ocean bridged of steamers; the space between this world and the celestial world bridged with wings, and all the immensities bridged with love. I am glad that you and I are immortal, and shall live to see the resplendent unification. We cannot afford to die any time within the next ten thousand years. We are going to live as long as God lives, and we want to be like him, and reign with him; so that wherever heaven may be, on this reconstructed earth, as many suppose; or in the star Alcyone, as some think; or in some realm as yet unimagined, we shall be supernally happy, wanting nothing, but having all things. In a salubrious atmosphere, tonic with the health of God. No fatigues of work like those which press us, but untiring locomotion from kingdom to kingdom, and from world to world, in style saintly or angelic. Forever with God, and forever with each other. Then lift up your heads in the anticipation. Why go sighing and vexed, when there are such raptures to come? Why be so exasperated by annoyances that shall be soon past? Let us live more and more in the future; our conversation in heaven; our thoughts in heaven; our ambition in heaven. Death will not be the end of us; it will be the beginning of our highest enjoyments and grandest activities.

It is one of my brightest anticipations of going into perpetual companionship with those with whom I have been associated in Christian work on earth. Many of them have already gone into the better country. Others stand abreast with me in the labor of the Gospel. We are cotemporaries in Christian service. The probability is that our departure will not be many years apart, and our graves not very far distant from each other. But, however, that may be, our spirits shall re-associate, and we who have prayed, and toiled, and sung together on earth shall unite in the celebrative gladness of the Upper Temple. Then we will talk it all over—our discouragements and our triumphs, and feel that nothing more remains but congratulation and jubilee. If this world were all, we might well break down, morose and melancholy. This life is a dead failure unless it opens into something grander and better. The most of our life on earth spent in drudgery, it is not an existence worth living unless it be introductory. Blessed be God for the assurance that these burdens are to be dropped, and these obstacles are to vanish, and in a land where there are no partings, and no struggles, we are to be gloriously united.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Certain editorial changes and improvements are now in contemplation by the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and before making them, we would like to ascertain the views of our friends on the following questions, and we invite all who are interested to answer on postal cards as soon as convenient:

1. Which of the various Departments that usually appear in the paper: The Sermons, the Editorial page, the Serial Story, the Home Circle, the Sunday School Lesson, THE MAIL-BAG, or the Church Societies' page—do you turn to and read first, and which do you find most interesting?

2. Do the members of your own family give preference to the same Departments or to some other and if so, which Department?

Address all postals on the subject to Editorial Department, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

N. W. Lawrence, Hillsboro, Tex. What are the names of the mountains about Jerusalem.

On the East of the city are Jebel el Tur (Mount of Olives), and Jebel Baten el Hawa (Mount of Offence); on the North, Scopus; on the South, Jebel Deir Abu Tor (Hill of Evil Counsel). Within the walls are Mount Moriah, the site of the Temple, and Mount Sion.

F. A. Rogers, Cook's, Mich. Is anything known definitely as to the year, day and hour of the crucifixion?

There have been disputes on all those points. The general opinion now, in view of all facts that have been ascertained, is that the crucifixion continued from nine A. M. to three P. M. on Friday, April 7, of the year 30. This, however, is only an opinion, and cannot be asserted positively.

Mary Tyng, Leavenworth, Kan. Who was Inaudi, whom I have heard referred to as the mathematical wonder? Is he still living?

Inaudi is a native of Piedmont, about twenty-six years of age, and is now living in Paris. When a mere boy his astonishing performances in algebra and geometry puzzled the most learned professors. He solves the most intricate problems with a rapidity that is marvelous. He has no marked ability in any other line than that of calculation.

Inquirer, Chatham, Ont. Paul says (Acts 26: 19), that he was not disobedient to the heavenly vision; had he the power to disobey?

Every man has the power to be disobedient. That is his distinction which gives him his superiority as a free agent. God designed him to be free to choose between the good and the evil, and encourages him to choose the good. God did not make man to be a slave, but a son. There was, however, compulsion in his own nature. If you are a husband and love your wife, we might say of you that you could not strike her; yet you know that you could do so if you chose. But as you are not brutal, it is legitimate to say that you could not do it. So Paul, being what he was, could not be disobedient. If he had a propensity in that direction, there was a stronger force in him, imparted by the Holy Spirit, compelling him to obey.

A.U. Q., Diamond Hill, R. I. Is it right for a married woman to give money for charitable and religious purposes privately if her husband is opposed to such gifts?

If she has money of her own, either inherited or earned by herself, she is justified in devoting what portion she pleases to religion or charity, even though her husband may not approve. It is a case of conscience in which her duty to God is paramount over her duty to her husband. If she has no money of her own, she may have an allowance from her husband for personal and housekeeping expenses from which she may save, by self-denial in dress, or economy in some other department, a sum which may be regarded as her own to use for religion and charity and the husband has no right to prohibit her. But she has no right to give away money which is the joint possession of herself and her husband without his consent. She should try to convince her husband of the duty of giving, but by all means avoid secrecy and deceit. We have no statistics on which to base an answer to your other questions.

Daily Reader, Albany, N. Y. What are the points of difference between the Protestant Episcopal Church and the Church of Rome?

The Protestant Episcopal Church was intended to be comprehensive, and its constitution was made so wide as to include many of many shades of belief. There are consequently people in that church whose faith differs but little from that of the Romish Church. There are others who have views strongly antagonistic to it. All, however, reject the authority of the Pope, which Catholics acknowledge. Besides this, a majority of the members of the Protestant Episcopal Church reject the doctrine of Transubstantiation, or the real presence of Christ, in the bread and wine of the Lord's Supper, which Catholics believe. The worship of the Virgin Mary and the celibacy of the clergy are other important points of difference.

Wm. M. Scott, Richmond, Ark. 1. How many churches are there in the United States? 2. How many church members? 3. Why celebrate Easter with eggs and why color them—what is the significance of the usage?

1 and 2. About 109,000, representing twenty-one Protestant denominations, with a total communicant membership of about 9,[illegible]. 3. It is an old custom preserved from heathen times. Easter or "Pasch" eggs are symbol of creation. The practice of presenting eggs to our friends is Persian or Magian, and bears allusion to the mundane egg for which Oromazd and Ahriman (the spirits of good and evil) were to contend until the end of the world. The custom prevailed also among the Egyptians, Hebrews and Hindus, and Christians adopted it to symbolize the resurrection. The color (originally red), was to symbolize the blood. In the early church, the colored eggs were eaten in remembrance of the resurrection.

Reader, Rocheport, Mo. 1. Is it wrong for a church member to jump for a pipe-organ? It is supposed that he goes to church to worship; to serve Christ. Is that serving him? 2. A man and her brother, who both loved to dance, pledged each other that they would not join a church so that they might feel free to dance. The brother is dead; the lady is nearly past middle life. Would she break her promise if she joined the church? What would you advise her to do?

1. It is a part of the service of the Lord's house, although a humble part, and if performed in the proper spirit, is just as acceptable as any other. 2. The pledge was a wicked one, entered into thoughtlessly, and improbability. It should be thrust aside as it should any barrier that stands between a soul and its salvation. It is a greater sin to keep a bad promise than to break it. She should improve her remaining years by uniting with God's people and herself becoming one of his children.

Jessie Boyd, Fargo, N. D. Do you believe that denominational separations can be removed, and all Christians unite in one church?

The efforts hitherto made have not been successful, but the thing is not impossible. The first step in that direction will probably be co-operation in Christian work. If the evangelical denominations would combine their means for home and foreign mission work and other philanthropic labor there would be a saving of money and work, which are now lost by competition. That is probably as far as union will go at present. But there should be a more friendly feeling and a clearer recognition of brotherhood between the denominations than now. We are not sure that organic union would lead to peace and harmony. We can imagine difficulties arising in a church in which some of the members were ardent Methodists, others Presbyterians and others strong Baptists, but there is no reason why they should not co-operate in aggressive work.

Subscriber. Where was the Garden of Eden located? I have heard it argued that it was a imaginary—the tree of knowledge, of good and evil being the perfect state of bliss in the mind and heart of our first parents. To me the Garden of Eden has ever seemed as real as Nazareth.

The word "Eden" means perfection of bliss or delight, and may therefore be regarded as descriptive of man's condition in his unfallen state. Various interpretations are given by commentators of the Mosaic description of Eden, and the orthodox Biblical scholars of all ages conclude that Eden was situated higher on the high table-land of Armenia, or, more probably, near the junction of the rivers Tigris and Euphrates in Syria. There have been a variety of other conjectures, however, some even claiming that the true site was in Ceylon. All agree that the Garden itself was an actuality and not a mere myth or legend.

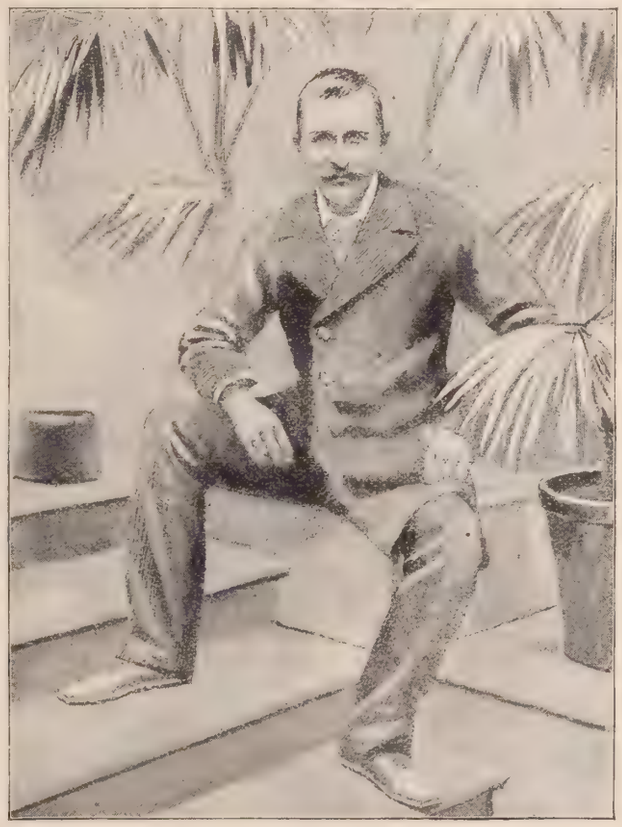
THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A THRILLING ESCAPE.

EUROPEAN journals announce the arrival in Cairo of an extraordinary man, the story of whose adventures reads like a romance. He was one of the lieutenants of the lamented General Gordon, and has been in captivity ever since that brave Christian officer perished. His name is Slatin; he is an Austrian by birth, and is about fifty years of age. In 1879 Gordon appointed him Inspector of the Eastern Soudan, and three years afterward he was promoted to the Governor-Generalship of Darfur. It was a position of extreme danger, for the whole Soudan was disaffected, and the tribes were only waiting a propitious moment to cast off Egyptian rule. For two years after his appointment at Darfur, Slatin held the province against overwhelming odds. One tribe after another broke out in insurrection, and Slatin could only maintain his position by suppressing one outbreak before another occurred. The Arabs dreaded him more than any enemy, for his swift movements and consummate generalship made up for the weakness of his force. His personal endurance and valor were celebrated in every district, and his name was a terror that kept many a tribe from rebellion. At length there was a deep-laid plot for a general rising. Slatin knew of it, and warned Gen. Gordon that with the forces at his disposal it would be impossible to maintain his position. But he knew that Gordon's safety depended on his making a stubbon resistance, and he was not the man to fail his chief in the emergency. When the storm broke, he had but seven hundred men against a force of more than twenty times their number. He laid his plans with wonderful skill and foresight; he was often thirty-four hours in the saddle, fighting all the while, without food, and performing prodigies of valor. He won several great battles with his little army, bringing out his men with small loss of life. Every day that he could prolong the struggle was a gain for Gordon, and he thought that surely Mr. Gladstone would not much longer delay sending help. But at last his ammunition was exhausted. He had but five rounds for a man, and then surrender was inevitable. The Mahdi held a great celebration when his dreaded prisoner was brought in. Slatin was loaded with chains and was compelled to march with the Mahdi's army to Khartoum. After Gordon's death, and the withdrawal of the English army, the severity of his captivity was a little relaxed, but the Mahdi would not let him out of his sight, and often threatened him with death. Ten years he has been held a prisoner, and compelled to serve the Mahdi, and never knew from day to day when his execution might be ordered. Early this year, the Egyptian war office heard that he was still alive, and opened communication with him, though friendly traders. In March last the camels were sent to a place near the scene of his captivity, and he was notified of his means of flight. He stole away from the camp and succeeded in getting to the hills beyond the desert. But the Mahdi soon detected his flight, and sent a large force in search of him. Slatin hid among the rocks, subsisting on dates and anything he could find, and often being nearly dead for want of water. Almost daily he saw bands of the Mahdi's Arabs scouring the plains below, in search of him, and often heard them pass the places where he concealed himself. After more than a month of hardship and breadth escapes, he reached Assouan, whence he made a quick journey to Cairo. So much will a man do and dare to escape from captivity. If men showed as much determination in the effort to escape from captivity to the enemy of souls, which is far more degrading and ruinous, their success would be certain and their reward infinitely greater. (Eph. 6: 11, 12.)

Judge's Dilemma.

Some amusement was caused at a police-court in New York last week by the naive confession of a defendant in a suit. It was brought by a woman who claimed that her husband failed to provide her with the means of support. She was asked what her husband's business was, but she confessed that she did not know. He had supported her for some time after their marriage, but of late had contributed nothing to the household expenses. The examination of the defendant was then opened, and there was the same difficulty in learning the man's trade. He admitted the truth of his wife charge, but pleaded that times were hard, that he wanted to quit his business, and had been unable to obtain other employment. The judge again pressed the question about his occupation, but the man asked to be excused mentioning it. Finally, a policeman present in court came to the rescue by informing the judge that the man was an expert pickpocket. The defendant calmly acknowledged that picking pockets was the business he had referred to, and reminded the judge that he had said he wanted to leave it. "But," he added, "I cannot get honest work, and if the court insists on my supporting my wife, there is only one way by which I can do it, and that is by going on picking pockets, for it is the only thing in which I am expert." The judge felt the force of the dilemma, and suspended the order for support on the assurance of the man that he would try to live honestly, and do his duty by his wife. The defendant's difficulty in less degree is a common experience. The man who embarks in a wrong course cannot leave it and return to the right without pain and embarrassment. That is why so few are converted after middle life. Many lose their souls because they cannot come to Christ without disappointing others, and breaking promises they ought not to have made, and abandoning habits they ought not to have formed. (Matt. 7: 14.)



SLATIN BEY, TEN YEARS A CAPTIVE OF THE MAHDI.

A Fortune Refused.

Few men have had the experience of refusing valuable gifts, but the "Daily News" of Tacoma, Wash., reports one such case. It is that of a resident of that city, named Henley, who probably owes his life to refusing the gift of twelve thousand dollars in gold. Some years ago he was making the voyage to San Francisco on the steamer "Pacific." One of his fellow passengers was a miner named Sampson, who had been working a mine on the Yakou River, in Alaska. He had grown tired of mining and had sold his share to his partners, and was on his way to San Francisco. He carried the proceeds of his labor, and of his share—twelve thousand dollars in all, in a belt around his body. While passing through the Straits of Juan de Fuca, the "Pacific" was struck by the Bark "Orpheus" and went down before the boats could be launched. Henley and Sampson were together when the collision occurred, and swam off from the wreck. They kept afloat for some time, and at last got on a chicken-coop which floated past them among other wreckage. The coop was a small affair, and it was rocked so violently by the waves that they were liable to be thrown off at any moment. Sampson remembered the gold around his body, and knew that its weight would be an awful impediment if he should have to swim for his life. He spoke of it to his companion, and offered to give him the belt and all it contained. But Henley knew it might be as dangerous to him as to its owner, and would not accept it. A few minutes afterward the coop gave a violent lurch, and both men were thrown off. Sampson sank, but Henley swam back to the coop, and after keeping his hold for several hours, was saved by a passing vessel. The circumstances in which the possession of a fortune involves peril to life are exceptional, but it often involves peril to the soul; yet there are few who would not brave that peril though the disaster when it does come is infinitely greater. (Matt. 10: 28.)

Pharaoh's Humiliation.

Tho irreverence of the moderns for high and mighty potentates who have passed away was illustrated recently in the custom-house of Cairo. Brugsch Bey, the famous explorer of the tombs of ancient Egypt, who discovered the mummy believed to be that of the Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites, recently found another mummy on the coffin of which was the royal cartouche, indicating that the body was that of one of the Pharaohs. He was delighted with his discovery and with great care packed it up for conveyance to Cairo. On arriving at the railroad station he was directed to have his "luggage" put in the luggage-van. The Bey was concerned about its safety and insisted on its going in the car with him. The officials consented on condition that the fare was paid as for a living passenger. Brugsch Bey accordingly paid Pharaoh's fare and the mummy went in the passenger coach. At the custom-house at Cairo a new difficulty arose. The custom officers demanded duty. The Bey explained that the package was the mummy of a Pharaoh and that no duty could be levied upon it. But the officers were convinced that it might be made dutiable under some category and they searched their lists for a suitable class. Finally, they decided to charge for it as dried fish, on which a duty is imposed. The Bey scorned to contend about the small charge involved, and the mummy having been weighed and the duty paid, the dead body of Pharaoh entered the capital of Egypt as a package of dried fish. With such contempt did they treat the body of a potentate who in his lifetime doubtless received the homage of all who came into his presence. In his case with startling force were the words of the prophet fulfilled that the terrible ones shall be despised and shall become as chaff. (Isa. 29: 5.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. Quarrier, of Glasgow, who is Building a Home for consumptives, whose portrait and life we published recently, has received a gift of five thousand dollars from some anonymous admirer of his work.

The First Sunday of June is Whitsunday, on which is celebrated the descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. The society for promoting Christian Unity asks pastors to preach on that day on the need of closer union among churches and Christian workers.

The People of Tabriz, where Dr. Mary Bradford remained during the recent scourge of cholera, have determined to build her a hospital, that she may have better facilities for her work among the needy and suffering ones.

Pennington Seminary (N. J.), will celebrate on May 2 and 3, the twenty-fifth anniversary of Dr. Hanlon's Presidency. The faculty and students will be glad to receive all alumni and their friends, who can make it convenient to join in the celebration.

The Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church reports receipts for the month of February of $23,054 against $29 192 for February of 1894. The total receipts for four months have been $117,710 against $70,545 for the corresponding period of last year.

The Success Attending Evangelist John T. Vine's labors at the Memorial Baptist Church, Brooklyn, of which Rev. Dr. H. W. Knapp is pastor, has been remarkable. The meetings were in progress six weeks and have resulted in many remarkable conversions.

At the Mott Haven Reformed Church, New York City, of which Rev. G. Edwin Talmage, a nephew of the Editor of this journal, is pastor, twelve members were received on Sunday, April 7, five on confession and a larger number of communicants was present than in many years past.

The Belgain Senate, Convinced That Free trade in intoxicants is a failure, has for some time been seeking a way of restricting the trade in alcohol. There is reason to believe that both in Belgium and France the liquor trade will soon be placed under stricter control.

The Bishop of Cremona, in Italy, where everyone drinks the wine of the country, has published a pastoral letter, in which he speaks of the vice of drunkenness, and declares that no diminution in the hours of labor, nor augmentation of wages, will do good till this vice is eradicated.

Miss Annie Taylor, the Founder of the Tibetan Pioneer Mission, whose portrait we published some months ago, has severed her connection with those who went out with her, but continues her work. Her former associates have formed the Tibetan Mission, having secured the leadership of Mr. Polhill Turner.

We Desire to Acknowledge Receipt of $75 from Mr. E. M. Johnson, dentist, St. Cloud, Minn., which he directs to be applied to the following good causes: $50 to Mrs. Jarrad's work among Syrian Girls in Jerusalem; $15 to the Bethesda Home for Fallen Girls, Brooklyn, and $10 toward Emma Mason's Gospel work among the Michigan Lumbermen.

Rev. J. K. Greene, the Eminent Missionary of Constantinople, has returned to this country for a vacation. Churches who desire to hear of the progress of Christianity in the Sultan's dominions, will be glad to avail themselves of Dr. Greene's visit. His address is 153 La Salle street, Chicago.

The American Board receipts for March are $47,509 against $53, 734 for March, 1894. The total of seven months has been $362 421 against $582,421 for the first seven months of the last financial year. The receips for the month show an increase of $1,916 in regular donations, and of $1,819 in donations for the debt, but a falling off in those for special object, and in legacies.

The Congregational Home Missionary Society, having closed its books, reports that its contributions from the churches were $10,269.84 more than the preceding year, while the legacies were $25,209.21 more, making a gain over last year in contributions and legacies of $33,509.05. On the other hand, securities from the transient fund to the value of $31,062.28, having been sold during the year, leaving the net gain in receipts only $2,446.77.

The New York Medical Missionary Institute, of which Dr. George D. Dowkontt is Director, has purchased the old John Stephenson homestead, with twenty acres of ground, at New Rochelle. The first deposit of $5,000 has been made, and an appeal is made for help towards raising the second instalment due this month. Dr. G. D. Dowkontt organized this institute about fourteen years ago, and during the last ten years more than one hundred missionaries have been sent out to India, Africa, China and other lands. There are now forty students in the institution.

The Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., Has just held a series of successful services in Rochester, N. Y. Preparatory services, consisting of union meetings of the Brick and Central Churches, were held for three weeks preceding his arrival. The services grew in interest from the beginning, and Dr. Chapman worked with astonishing energy. On some days he held as many as eight meetings and preached to nine thousand persons. Two churches have received two hundred and eighty new members already. Over one thousand inquirers' cards were signed during the meetings.

Mr. Moody Has Proposed Special Arrangements for school teachers who desire to obtain the advantage of study in the Bible Institute but after the work of the winter feel unable to take the full course laid out for regular students. Accordingly, a special course has been prepared by which they can share in the study, and work so far as their strength will permit, and can also pursue a musical course if desired. Besides the usual lectures, Dr. A. T. Pierson, of Philadelphia, is expected in June, and Dr. Webb Peploe, of London, is expected in September. Applications may be made to Miss E. S. Strong, 230 La Salle Avenue, Chicago.

A Temperance Apostle.

John Noble Stearns' Life-Work Closed—A Grand Career of Christian Duty.

FEW names were better known in Europe or America, in connection with devoted and successful work in the cause of temperance, than that of John Noble Stearns, whose worldly career ended last week at the age of sixty-six. He died at his home in Greenpoint, L. I., after a protracted illness. Mr. Stearns was a native of New Hampshire, and all his life was essentially a man of action. When only seven years old, he joined the "Cold-water Army," a temperance juvenile organization of Ipswich, N. H., and even in his young manhood he was prominent as a leader in the temperance cause. In 1858, he was chosen as Grand Worthy Patriarch of the New York State Division, Sons of Temperance, and in 1866 was elected Most Worthy Patriarch of the National Division of North America. He was a member of the first lodge of Good Templars organized in this country and afterward filled the highest offices in the Order for many years. He was chosen President of the New York State Temperance Society in 1875 and 1876 and was also presiding officer of several State and National Temperance Conventions. For many years he was editor of the "National Temperance Advocate," and under his management as Secretary of the National Temperance Union a vast quantity of most effective temperance literature has been issued and circulated throughout the Union, accomplishing results in the direction of education and reform among the masses that cannot be set forth in mere words or figures.

Mr. Stearns was a man of high moral principle, a thorough Christian and a most faithful and vigorous worker in the cause. He was an able parliamentarian, a magnetic speaker and a writer learned in statistics and in the powerful logic of facts, which he employed to best advantage. Among his friends he ranked many of the brightest Christian philanthropists of the age, who loved him no less for his warm championship of temperance principles than for his sterling character as a man and for the ardor with which he espoused every good work. One of the most important tasks of his later years was the compilation of the papers, addresses, essays and discussions of the World's Temperance Congress, held in Chicago, which was reviewed in THE CHISTIAN HERALD at the time of its publication two years ago.

SHEPERD of tender youth,
Guiding in love and truth,
Through devious ways:
Christ our triumphant King,
Join we thy name to sing,
And our dear children bring,
Shouting thy praise!

Most high and holy Lord,
Glorious, revealing Word,
Healer of strife:
Thou didst thyself abase,
That from sin's deep disgrace
Thou mightest save our race,
Giving us life.

Thou art our great High Priest;
Thou hast prepared the feast
Of holy love:
In all our sin and pain
None call on thee in vain;
Help thou didst not disdain,
Help from above.

Ever be near our side,
Allwise and mighty Guide,
Our Staff and Song.
Jesus, thou Christ of God,
Taught by thy living Word,
Lead us where thou hast trod,
Make our path straight.

Thus now, and till we die,
Sound we thy praises high,
And joyful sing
With all the holy throng
Who to the Church belong,
Join we to swell the song
To Christ our King!

Women of Ancient Egypt.

They were Influential in Affairs of State as well as in the Domestic Circle.

IN a recent publication of the American Geographical Society, much valuable and interesting information is given concerning the condition and status of the women of ancient Egypt. They were not only conspicuous in affairs of State, but they played an important part in ecclesiastical matters, combining with their ordinary duties those of priestess or prophetess. Women of the common or middle classes were more independent than women of the same rank elsewhere. Daughters inherited from their father's fortune a share equal to that of their brothers. The wife was the mistress of her house, and the husband was there only as a privileged guest. She came and she went at her pleasure. Unlike the women of Syria, she entered the society of men with face uncovered.

There was no difference between the costume of mother and daughter, between high-born and servants, except, perhaps, a little embroidery or other decoration in the upper seam. The woman's forehead, chin and bosom were delicately tinted with indelible tattoo, her lips were painted red, and around her eyes were borders of black, which extended over her temples almost to her hair. The powder which she used for this purpose was a mixture of antimony and carbon pounded fine. This decoration was supposed to enhance the whiteness of the complexion, give brilliancy to her appearance and protect her eyes from opthalmia.

The ordinary woman of ancient Egypt married young, became a mother at fifteen, a grandmother at thirty, and aged rapidly, both because of such youthful marriage and of the prodigious household tasks she performed. Yet her position in the family was not affected by her premature disfigurement. And the Egyptian husband was pleased with the honor shown his wife by all who came in contact with her. Egyptian wives had full control of their property, seemingly a control unsurpassed in many ways even to-day. There came, however, a complete overthrow of such ideas during the administration of the fourth Ptolemy (Philopater), who reigned from 222 to 205 B. C.

Under his predecessor, Ptolemy Eurgetes, a wife could dispose of her property as she pleased, but from the fourth year of Philopater it was the husband alone who could dispose of the property of his wife, and she must submit. It was as though all of a sudden every married woman in Egypt became dispossessed of all her property; of every building and foot of land she owned; of every certificate of stock; of every dress, ornament, sandal or shoulder-strap, even of the ostrich feather she wore on her head, all were restrained. It was a most sweeping revolution. It was a social earthquake from which Egyptian women never recovered.

BILLY'S CRUTCH.

BY REV. C. H. MEAD.

"WILL you please buy my geranium, sir?"

If a musical voice, a bright face, and a beautiful plant, all belonging to a young girl with dimpled cheeks and laughing blue eyes, will not bring a man to a standstill, then it must be that he is hurrying through the world too fast, and wants nothing to come into his life that will gladden his heart and renew his youth.

I came to a full stop, and would not have missed that sight for a great deal. As the girl stood there on that bright October morning, it was difficult to tell where the sunshine left off and the girl began. They seemed made for each other; it was a perfect match with the dividing line hard to discern.

"Have you any objection to tell me your name?"

"Oh, no, sir! My name 's Gertrude Wilson."

"What a beautiful geranium you have there."

"Is n't it lovely?

"Indeed, it is, and the finest one I ever saw. Where did you get it?"

"About three years ago, a lady left a slip lying on the seat in the horse-car. I took it home, got the richest dirt I could find, put it in this old paint can, and then set the slip in it, and it began growing right away. I've given it plenty of water to drink, and kept it in the sunshine as much as possible."

"Why, I should think you would love it very dearly."

"Love it! I guess I do love it. It seems just like a part of myself."

"Well, my dear, if you love it so much, pray tell me why you want to sell it?"

"Oh, I would n't let it go, if I did not want to help God answer Billy's prayer. Don't you think it splendid to help answer somebody's prayer?"

"How do you know I believe in prayer?"

"Oh, I am sure you do, for you have a prayerful look."

She broke out into a merry laugh, and I joined her in it, as I said: "Yes, I do believe in prayer. Now tell me who Billy is?"

As I made this request, a joyous look came into her face, and her large blue eyes shone with delight; and as the dimples deepened in her cheeks, I beheld a picture that was worth going a long way to see.

"What! Billy? Oh, he 's the nicest and best little fellow in all the city! Why, he is goodness, sunshine, and music all in one lump. Somebody let him drop when he was quite young and broke his hip, and ever since he has been a cripple. But his leg is the only crooked thing about him. My mother says that Billy's mother was the best Christian she ever knew. Well, when she died last year, everybody in our tenement house wanted to adopt Billy; so you see, he belongs to all of us. He pays his way by selling newspapers, and no one with good legs can get around livelier than Billy can with a crutch. But yesterday, his crutch caught in a hole in the sidewalk, broke in two, and let him fall. He managed to get in the house, and was not hurt. Well, last night just as I was going to bed, I heard Billy praying. His room is next to mine, and only a board partition between—so I could hear it all. Oh, I shall never forget his words, as he said: 'Dear Lord, I 've never complained about my broken hip, and I am willing to go through life with it, but I can't get on without a crutch. I've no money to get another, and I don't know who to ask, so please, Lord, send me another one. Mother always told me to go to you, when I was in trouble, and so I come now. Please, dear Lord, answer my prayer for Jesus sake. Amen.'

"I laid awake a good while thinking of that prayer, and it was the first thing I thought of this morning, and I began wondering if I could n't do something to help God answer Billy 's prayer. Well, while I was wondering, I saw my geranium, and then I said, 'Oh, maybe I can sell it and get enough to buy another crutch!'

"Now, you know who Billy is, and why I want to sell my geranium. Won't you, please, buy it?"

I was greatly moved and interested, and I'll own up to a great deal of moisture about my eyes, as I inquired: "How tall is Billy?"

"Oh!" she quickly responded, "I've got the measure of his old crutch, if that is what you mean."

"Yes, that is just what I mean, so if you please, Gertrude, we'll go and see about a crutch."

It did not take us long to find a store where such a thing was to be procured, but a great while to get the keeper of the store as much interested as I was in the girl's story. Just the right kind of a crutch was found, and a minimum price put upon

"Well," I said, "I'll give you that much for the geranium, Gertrude, and it is very cheap at that."

"Oh, thank you," she said, and her eyes fairly danced with gladness. "I'll take the crutch, please, but Billy mustn't know a word about where it came from. Is n't it just splendid to help God answer Billy's prayer?"

The moisture in my eyes, did n't subside one bit, as I said, "I want you to do me a favor, Gertrude. I am hundreds of miles away from the place where I live, and I can't carry this plant around with me. Would it be too much trouble for you to keep it for me?"

"What, do you want I should take care of it for you?"

"Yes, my dear, if it will not be too much trouble."

"Oh, you splendid man, you! I'll be glad to do it, and I'll take just as good care of it, as I did when it was mine."

I carried the plant, while she carried the crutch, and after reaching the house, Billy was called in to see me, while Gertrude smuggled the crutch into his room, and came back with a face as happy as an angel could be, but never betraying to Billy by word or look, that she had been answering Billy's prayer.

To sum it all up, Billy has a new crutch, and he is the happiest cripple in the great city. Gertrude helped answer his prayer, and a happier girl don't live. I own the handsomest geranium bush I ever saw, but the one who takes care of it for me, is as proud as I am of that plant. Is there anything else? Oh, yes! Who was the lady that dropped or threw away that geranium slip in the street-car? I wish I knew, for if it had not been for her, no one would ever have read the story of Billy's crutch.

THE WESTERN RELIEF FUND

REPORTS of final relief work have been received during the week from a number of distributors in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado and South Dakota. All report favorable conditions, and state that incalculable good has been done through the agency of the Relief Fund.

The Relief Committee of Gregory Co., S. Dak., who made a special appeal to the farmers of that section through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and to whom a remittance was sent from the Relief Fund, write:

> Your donation was received in time to help us in buying seed wheat. Teams were started immediately to purchase seed and it will be distributed in five-bushel lots. This will supply only about one-fourth of our farmers. Most of them are sorry in need of seed oats, corn and potatoes. Our outlook is very favorable for a good crop this season. In behalf of the people of Gregory County, we return heartfelt thanks for the liberal donation bestowed.

FLOWERS AND INSECTS.*

MANY flowers make themselves useful to the insect world by secreting somewhere within their dainty cups little glands of honey or, more properly speaking, nectar, for honey is the result of the bees' work. This nectar is highly prized by the insects and is, in many cases, the only object which attracts them to the flower, although sometimes the pollen, which Darwin believes to have been the only inducement offered formerly, is sought as well.

But of course this nectar does to induce visits unless the bee's attention is first attracted to the blossom, and it is tempted to explore the premises; and we now observe the interesting fact that those flowers which depend upon insect-agency for their pollen, usually advertise their whereabouts by wearing bright colors or by exhaling fragrance. It will also be noted that a flower sufficiently conspicuous to arrest attention by its appearance alone is rarely fragrant.

When, attracted by either of these significant characteristics,—color or fragrance,—the bee alights upon the blossom, it is sometimes guided to the very spot where the nectar is hidden by markings of some vivid color. Thrusting its head into the heart of the flower for the purpose of extracting the secreted treasure, it unconsciously strikes the stamens with sufficient force to cause them to powder its body with pollen. Soon it flies away to another plant of the same kind, where, in repeating the processs just described, it unwittingly brushes some of the pollen from the pistil blossom upon the pistil of the second, where it helps to make new seeds. Thus these busy bees which hum so restlessly through the long summer days are working better than they know and are accomplishing more important ends than the mere honey-making which we usually associate with their ceaseless activity.

Those flowers which are dependent upon night-flying insects for their pollen continue to make themselves notable by wearing white or pale yellow,—red, blue, and purple being with difficulty detected in the darkness. They, too, frequently indicate their presence by exhaling perfume, which in many cases increases in intensity as the night falls and a clue to their whereabouts becomes momentarily more necessary. This fact partially accounts for the large proportion of fragrant white flowers. Darwin found that the proportion of sweet-scented white flowers to sweet-scented red ones was 10 per cent. of white to 8.2 of red.

We notice also that some of these night fertilized flowers close during the day, thus insuring themselves against the visits of insects which might rob them of their nectar or pollen, and yet be unfit by the shape of their bodies to accomplish their fertilization. On the other hand, many blossoms which are dependent upon the sun-loving bees close at night, securing the same advantage.

When there are flowers which close in the shade, others at the approach of a storm, thus protecting their pollen and nectar from the dissolving rain; others close at the same time every day. Linnæus invented a famous "flower-clock," which indicated the hours of the day by the closing of different flowers. This habit of closing has been called the "sleep of flowers."

THE VISTA OPENED.

The Plan of Future Ages of the World's Existence as Indicated in Prophecy.*

BY GEORGE F. TRENCH, B.A.

THE direct revelation as to the kingdom's final form is wholly derived from the New Testament. The earlier Scriptures, which prophesy so fully the millennial state, give us but hints here and there as to the New Creation Kingdom of Christ, yet hints not to be lightly overlooked. For example, in the eighth day of the Mosaic code, we have a type of the period in question. Without fixing any actual time to the present dispensation, we may certainly agree with all interpreters, that the Millennium is typified morally, if not chronologically, by the Sabbath, or seventh day.

But Scripture points to an eighth day (see Lev. 23: 16), "the morrow after the Sabbath;" and (verses 36 and 39) to eight-day celebrations. The seventh day has to do with the old creation, for God rested upon it, and gave it to man for his rest from toil. It is the old creation rest, earthly, human, natural. It is also imperfect. So the Millennium will bring in an earthly, human, natural, and imperfect day, or period of rest for the world. For Israel chiefly, but for all nations if they will have it.

But the eighth day, the first day of the week, the day of the Lord's resurrection, and the day of Pentecost, too, points to the new creation rest. After the imperfect rest of nature on the seventh comes the supernatural and perfect rest of resurrection on the eighth day. So the perfect glory of the risen Christ in connection with a resurrection Kingdom will come in upon the morrow of the Sabbatic Millennium. (Examine Num. 26: 35, with Lev. 9: 1; and 23: 36-39.) Note, therefore, that this eighth day cannot point to the Millennium, which is represented by the seventh. And it cannot be Eternity, for it is a day or definite period, like each of the preceding days.

As to the duration of that Age, we have, so far, purposely avoided any discussion—not because it is in any way illegitimate, but because it is a mere question of detail. Let us ask our Bibles what the duration of this Age of Ages is to be. And although, so far as I now see, we have not here the same clear information, there are indications sufficient to give some approximate idea on the subject.

That the duration of the Kingdom will not be only for a moment, but of long continuance, is shown, better than elsewhere, by reference to the description of the New Jerusalem.

1. It is the Bride: a term, no doubt, indicative of a very brief and passing condition in human life; but it is "the Lamb's wife" in the angel's next word, a state of permanence, abiding duration, settled established union.

2. Then we read that the nations shall walk in the light of it, and that the kings shall bring their glory into it, and that the gates shall not be shut at all (see R. V.). All these features, surely, represent a lasting, abiding state—not one suddenly appearing, and presently to cease.

3. But, perhaps, the pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb, is the best, as it is the most beautiful, sign of this fact. Nothing, in nature, perhaps, points the poetical spirit more surely towards a continuing, lasting, restful life, than the perpetual flow of the deep, still stream.

4. The servants of God therein, we are told, shall reign, not for a moment, like a flash of lightning glory, but unto the ages of the ages (22: 5); this ought to be conclusive of the theory that there is a period between the Millennium and Eternity.

HOW TO HELP THE CHURCH.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing May 12. I. Cor. 12: 1-27.

EVERY member of a church, however humble, can help it in some way. Great gifts are not essential to helpfulness. Young men hugely mistake the aim and purpose of the Church when they aspire to the ministry with the idea that in that way only is useful service possible to them. Nothing could be more simple than the conception Christ had of the Church. It was a body of men and women personally and individually united to him by a living faith, loving each other and helping each other, as brethren of one family, of which he was the head. To each one he would give life and that life would develop and manifest itself with variety as infinite as the variety of countenance and form. The one thing indispensable was absolute personal loyalty to the Head of the Church and all else was free and varied. He prescribed no system of church organization, no form of worship, no creed, and he insisted with more emphasis than he gave to any other teaching that there should be no precedence of one over another but all should be brethren. The apostle Paul reiterates the principle in the passage selected as the basis of the topic. "If the whole body were an eye," he argues, "where were the hearing?" It is obvious then that the service that may be best rendered to the church allows for the exercise of individuality. The individual can serve the Church best by bringing into the common stock his own special and peculiar gifts and using them for the common benefit. There is room for all. The gift of teaching, persuasive eloquence, the magnetic personality that wins children, the melodious voice or skill in instrumental music, the business capacity—the gift a man possesses whatever it may be can be exercised in Christ's service. Even those who have no gift but patience, may lead so beautiful a life in untoward circumstances, or in suffering as to compel the admiration of all who know it, as to lead them to admire the power that makes such a life possible. At this period we have come to have great confidence in the power of organization—and the existence of our Society and of kindred societies is a proof that we are right—but after all, the strength of Christianity is in the individual. There would be no power in the best organization of the Church if the individual members were weak and worldly and corrupt. The best help therefore that can be given to the church is that of the individual life, every man living for Christ, seeking in every way to commend him to those who know him not. Such a spirit will promote comradeship. Each will respect another who is striving in his own way for the same end. There will be a readiness for co-operation, a desire to supplement and assist other men's efforts, an endeavor to fill up what is lacking, and a willingness to undertake inconspicuous and humble duties. Beside all this there will be an absence of censorious criticism, a disposition to think charitably of the unwise and the erring and a recognition of the brotherhood of every one who loves and serves Christ. There could be no better service rendered to the church than this exhibition of the spirit of Christ in humility, in love, in tenderness and helpfulness. It would find abundant opportunities for exercise and would develop the same spirit in others. The Church life would be broadened and deepened and strengthened for aggressive work in extending Christ's kingdom in the world.

THREE STATE PRESIDENTS.

Our friends of the Christian Endeavor Society will be glad to have the three portraits which appear on this page. They are the leaders of the societies in their respective States. Mr. Frederick S. Ball, who is the President of the State Union of Alabama, is an Ohioan by birth, and is now in his thirtieth year. He is a graduate of the Ohio State University, from which he matriculated some seven years ago with high honors. After a short career in teaching and journalism he studied for the law, and is now a prominent lawyer of Montgomery, Ala. At the University and in his adopted State he took an active part in the work of the Young Men's Christian Association, and was a zealous member of the Christian Endeavor Society. His earnestness and devotion to all Christian work brought him into prominence in the State organization, and at the close of last year he was chosen president of the Alabama Union.

FRED'K S. BALL, of Alabama. REV. CHARLES H. CRAWFORD, of Louisiana. W. L. NOELL, of Tennessee.

THREE PRESIDENTS OF STATE UNIONS OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

Rev. Charles H. Crawford is President of the State Union of Louisiana. Mr. Crawford is a New York man and made his first acquaintance with his adopted State during the war. He was a soldier in the Union Army at the age of seventeen, and served in it to the close of the war. After peace was proclaimed he set to work to complete his education, and for several years he spent all his time in alternately studying and teaching. After a term of service as Principal of the High School at Ovid, N. Y., he entered the Congregational ministry. He did a great deal of missionary work in Louisiana and Texas under the auspices of the the American Missionary Association, and during his journeys made the acquaintance of his present church at Hammond, La., where he has gathered a large and aggressive church out of a rapidly increasing population. He is a strong believer in Sunday School work and in Temperance, and in both causes he is a valiant worker with tongue and pen. Such a man was not likely to let so valuable an agency as Christian Endeavor escape his notice. He was one of the first ministers in the South to put it to use in the church, and he has from the beginning urged its adoption on his brother ministers. The State Union wisely placed him at its head, and he has been a most successful President.

Mr. W. L. Noell is a Presbyterian of the Cumberland Church, and is a native of Tennessee. He is a prominent business man of Nashville, and has brought into Christian Endeavor work the same organizing faculties and the same energy and concentration of effort which have distinguished him in commercial circles. Early in the history of the movement he was superintendent of the Memphis district, and In 1892 he was elected President of the State Union. He is now in his third year of service in that capacity.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

Many Chapters are arranging for suitable exercises in celebration of the sixth anniversary of the Organization of the Epworth League on May 15. Where the celebration takes place on Sunday it will be held on May 12.——A new Organization has been formed in Boston, Mass. It is to include in an Association, to be called "The Boston Circuit of the Epworth League," the officers of the Chapters in the city and suburbs. A school of methods in the different departments will be formed in connection with it, and specialists in each department will be invited to lecture.——The question of introducing the Epworth League in England, has been under discussion by a Committee appointed by the Conference. A strong feeling was manifested against the introduction of any organization which might weaken the class-meeting, and some of the ministers thought the League might have that effect. If it is finally decided to have any new Young People's Society, it is not to take the name of Epworth League. ——The Illinois State Convention, at Rock Island, on April 4 and 5, was a successful gathering. Sunrise prayer-meetings, stirring talks from local leaders, and the great consecration meeting made the occasion one of stimulating power.——The Mississippi Leagues are preparing for a great conference at Grenada, on May 9. Special railroad rates have been arranged, and a large attendance is expected.——A number of the students of Grant University have recently been converted and have become active workers in the Epworth League at Athens, Tenn.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

An excellent plan in connection with the Christian Culture Courses was adopted recently by the Baptist Young People's Union of Brantford, Ont. On a certain evening the members brought short papers on each course of study and read them at the meeting, thus showing how much they remembered in each department.

The National Council of the Young Men's Christian Associations of England, has had under consideration inquiries from various quarters as to the propriety of introducing billiards into the amusement room as the Association. After an exhaustive discussion the following resolution was adopted: "We are of opinion that recreation —properly so-called — as cricket, boating, gymnastics, swimming and cycling, and such games as are by general consent to be beneficial, should be warmly encouraged. They do not regard the game of billiards as coming under this category, and recommend therefore that the inclusion of this in the arrangements of the Y. M. C. A. should not be entertained."

Dr. F. L. Wilkins, Secretary of the Baptist Young People's Union in the course of his recent Western tour met a number of young people from a town where they have no pastor, in fact, have had none for months, but the B.Y.P.U. meets every Sunday and keeps the church doors open, and they will stay open as long as that brave little band keeps faithful to its pledge and its mission.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYER.

During the past week a large number of letters containing requests for prayer have been received. They were sent to the Sunday Afternoon Converts' Prayer-meeting at the Bowery Mission, and prayers were offered in accordance with them. As the writers desire also the prayers of our readers, we append a short summary of the letters, which in many instances are very lengthy.

E. R. S., Hagerstown, Md., who tells us that the prayers which were asked in these columns several weeks ago have been answered, now asks again for prayers for her own conversion.

For the conversion of their relatives many of our readers are praying and desire others to unite with them. Some are mothers concerned about their sons, others, persons who have urgently pressing husbands, or wives. In each of the following cases the conversion of some loved one is desired: "A Very Anxious Mother, Duluth, Minn.; "A Mother," Stamford, Vt.; Mrs. E. A. H., South Meriden, Ct.; "A Poor Girl," Riverdale, Tenn.; M. A. B., Penn Centre, N. Y.; "One who Believes in Prayer," Chicago; "Sister Young;" "A. C. F.," S. Our Japanese Sisters.

They are making Rapid Progress in Civilization—Domestic Life in the Island Empire—Classes at Hiroshima.

NOW that the war between the two great Asiatic powers, China and Japan, is ended, the civilizing influences that have been at work in the latter country for the past twenty years will doubtless soon make themselves felt among the Chinese people. Almost every letter from missionaries in the far East received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives cheering assurances of the present outlook. It would almost appear that such a war was needed to break down the last great barriers erected by heathenism against the advance of Christian civilization. And now that the oldest and most exclusive of nations is about to open its territory to the world, who can foretell what brilliant triumphs may be in store for the Gospel during the next decade?

For the present, Japan is the land toward which the eyes of the whole world are turned with eager curiosity. Her sudden leap into power and prominence, has made everything about her people intensely interesting. Their customs, morals, traditions and literature; their domestic and public affairs; their venerable history which goes back far beyond the earliest records of the Western peoples, and their peculiar religious beliefs are all just now being discussed in every quarter of the civilized globe.

Japanese houses are probably the funniest structures extant. In his delightful book, "The Real Japan," Henry Norman gives this description of one:

"From the outside it is an uninviting big black box. Inside it is a spotless doll's house magnified to unusual diameters, all wood and wicker and white paper. The entrance hall is a platform raised a couple of feet above the ground, where you take off your boots if you are a foreigner, or leave your sandals if you are Japanese. A screen door slides back and you are in—but that depends upon circumstances. Sometimes you are in one room and sometimes in another. It may be a general sitting-room ten feet square: it may be in a bed-room if you call early in the morning: or you may find yourself in an improvised sanctum and intruding upon someone writing laboured descriptions for a far-away public. For here walls have not only ears, they have also legs, and when you wish to make a new room it is simply "form square" by sliding enough panels in their grooves to enclose the space, or at your pleasure all the rooms can be thrown into one, enlarged, in our case by forty-six panels. Those forming the sides of the house consist each of sixty white paper panes. To wet one's finger, stick it slightly into the window and peep through, is thus the ideal Japanese counterpart of Occidental surreptitious inspection by the keyhole. The floor is of mats; not mats strewed about as at home, but solid structures of delicate stuffed wicker, an inch thick, conventional and regular size let into the floor.—artistic, spotless, immovable, never profaned by even the daintiest of slippers. Chairs and tables are, of course, unknown, and the posture of repose is to seat itself on one's heels. This squatting, by the way, is very painful at first, and takes a deal of training.

The typical Japanese hotel, (as shown in one of our illustrations), is quite as odd in its way as the private dwelling. Here strangers, travelers and pilgrims are comfortably entertained at a cost which, to a European or American would seem ridiculously small. The pilgrim may be en route to Fujiyama, the "sacred mountain," or to any one of the thousands of shrines that abound in the empire, for at certain seasons of the year pilgrims are as plentiful in Japan as bees in a flower-garden; or he may be a visitor from a distant clime who has come to study this picturesque land and its queer little people. In either event, he will soon be made equally at home by the hospitable landlord, for the Japanese are, of all Asiatics, the most cordial to strangers within their gates.

Not the least hopeful sign of the times in Japan is the moral and intellectual progress of its women. Writing upon this subject, Mrs. J.W. Lambuth, a devoted missionary, says: "The people on the 'Inland Sea,' at Hiroshima, sent us an invitation to go there and open a day-school for women and girls. We were asked to cut patterns of many kinds, to teach knitting and some cooking in order that the women might be prepared to make and prepare such clothing and food as their husbands and brothers, who had assumed more or less of European customs, would require. This work also gave opportunity for telling the Gospel story.

"It is no small pleasure to say that in Hiroshima there is a well-organized boarding school for young women, also a kindergarten, a cooking class, Bible classes and Sunday Schools of various kinds. The church membership that began in 1886, grew until a school-house could not accommodate the congregation, and the people gave as they could. Our Japan Church Extension Society added to the fund, and some private gifts made it possible to build, dedicate and use the house set apart for the worship of the true God. Various missionary women, married and single, have shared in the work at Hiroshima; they have lived in the native hotels upon the mats, and in other Japanese houses, and often, the people wrote and asked that a gentleman teacher come to them, that they could not wait for the foreign ladies; they wanted to learn there and then."

It has been said that the native woman is "the crown of Japan." May it not yet be proved that she is in a spiritual sense, its brightest jewel whose light will aid in guiding the new nation into the Kingdom?

have made it their business to see and become acquainted with every accessible Japanese woman. The people have learned to think well of the foreign missionary women among them and wonder if more are not coming!

"Going from Hiroshima up the Inland Sea, there came a call from interested people at Tadotsu on the island of Shikoku, and there the women gladly joined the men in giving an invitation to us to come and teach them. We went and the going was blessed with much interest, so much that when the work among women at Kobe became so pressing that we could not leave it

Village Gossip.

After dwelling for a considerable time in a village, writes Dr. Talmage, you are apt to know a multitude. A country village affords no retreat. There everybody knows everybody's business. You cannot raise half a dozen goslings without having them stoned for picking off your neighbor's gooseberries. Gossip wants no better heaven than a small village. Miss Glib stands at her gate three times a day talking with old Mrs. Chatterbox, and on rainy days at the blacksmith shop the whole business of the town is discussed by the male gossips who gather there. Everybody knows whether this morning out of the butcher cart you bought mutton or calf's liver, and the mason's wife, at the risk of breaking her neck, rushes down-stairs to exclaim, "Just think of it! Mrs. Stuckup has bought a sirloin steak, and she is no better than other people!" Your brass kettle is always borrowed. A bandbox was seen going from the millinery-shop to the house of a villager on Saturday afternoon, and on Sunday morning a score of people are early at church, head half-turned to the door, ready to watch the coming in of the new purchase. They always ask what you gave for a thing, and say you were cheated; had something of a better quality they could have let you have for half the money. We have at different times lived in a small village, and many of our best friends dwell there, but we give as our opinion that there are other places just as free from discomfort.

THE BOTTOM DRAWER.

THERE are whips and toys and pieces of string,
There are shoes which no little feet wear
There are bits of ribbon and broken rings,
And tresses of golden hair;
There are little dresses folded away
Out of the light of the sunny day.

There are dainty jackets that never are worn;
There are toys and models of ships;
There are books and pictures, all faded and torn,
And marked by the finger-tips
Of dimpled hands that have fallen to dust;
Yet I strive to think that the Lord is just.

And then I think of my children three,
My babies that never grow old,
And know they are waiting and watching for me,
In the city with streets of gold.
Safe, safe from the cares of the weary years,
From sorrow and sin and war;
And thank my God with, falling tears,
For the things in the bottom drawer.

FROM A BULGARIAN MOTHER.

PARENTS in all parts of the world write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and at times (as in the letter given below), they give us such pleasant glimpses of home-life in other lands that we feel encouraged to hope that they will pardon us for laying an extract from their letters before our readers. Mrs. E. R. Terzieva, of Samokov, writes:

We received your beautiful premium, and the paper. Now let me tell you how I like it. The "Pathway of Life" is a treasure of priceless value—just the kind I love to read. My husband desires also that you shall know how thankful we are for the book, and for the paper also. With every number we like it more and more. It has an authoritative power which cannot but influence us strongly for good. I am a Bulgarian woman, born in a town named Kezanlik, whose plains in the month of May are dressed in pink and white rose-blossoms. There they produce the best attar of roses. Oh, it is a beautiful spot and every tourist should visit it: to see its gardens, vineyards, fruit-trees, springs of warm mineral water and many other blessings. About ten years ago I was a graduate of the American Boarding-School, which is in this place. That very year I was married to a young man who was graduated from the Boys' Theological Seminary in this town, also, and who was to be pastor of one of our churches in Bulgaria. I was eighteen then. My mother is a Christian, and though my father did not want me married to a Protestant, I wished to be true to my Saviour and to all the good things I had heard of in school. We lived seven years in Yanboul, the place of whose church my husband was a pastor; and then his health began to fail, and we thought that a change of place and work would help him, so we came to Samokov, where my husband teaches in the Boys' Seminary.

We have four little children. This town is a place of poverty; though there are some rich people of the orthodox church, but they are not used to giving. There are about ten or thirteen families of Christian people here, besides the scholars of both schools. The schools are doing an excellent work for our nation. The girls that go out from here are looked upon as possessing a higher and a better education than other girls—though there are some very good gymnasiums in our cities.

"There are nine Christian Protestant churches, besides those of the Methodist Mission. I read in your paper that some ask the prayers of you and your readers in different things. I ask your prayers for Bulgaria, that God will lead her out of the difficult political position in which she is just now, and make her a truly Christian nation, that the truth should be sought after and lived accordingly. I shall wait for an answer from the Lord. We owe much to your country—America—for sending us the missionaries who brought us the true Light, and who are daily preaching to us by word, and by their good, exemplary lives. I say my thanks through you to all the good people of America. May the Lord bless them all. One of your delighted readers,

ALICE MAPLETON'S ORDEAL

A STORY OF NOBLE FORTITUDE UNDER TRIAL.

Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by E. CARSWELL.

Summary of Preceding Chapters.

Alice Mapleton is the daughter of a merchant who is supposed to be very wealthy. During his last illness, her lover, Fred Morgan, a clerk in Mr. Mapleton's employ, warns the family that Mr. Jackson, who is Mr. Mapleton's partner, is plotting to defraud them. When Mr. Mapleton dies, his partner assures the family that they are penniless. Even Mrs. Mapleton's jewels which she supposed were in the office safe, had been sold. Mr. Mapleton's life insurance also had been assigned to the business and their furniture must also be sacrificed. They believe that Mr. Jackson is defrauding them but are unable to prove it. Alice's lover, Fred Morgan, obtains an appointment as supercargo of a ship and sails for Mexico and thence to China. Alice's brother, Will, finds some shares of a mine in New Mexico among his father's papers and goes out there to look after their interests. Some time afterward, his trunk is sent back to his mother, with a letter, saying that Will has been killed by Indians. Alice and her mother struggle on alone and in deep poverty. In the emergency, Alice takes various articles to pawn and the Jew pawnbroker, Mr. Jacobs, pities and befriends her. Mr. Jackson continues to press his suit and when Alice rejects his attentions, plots to increase her troubles, that she may become so poor and miserable that she will accept him for her mother's sake and her own. He follows her to the tenement house where they live, and while he is threatening her there, Mrs. Callaghan, an Irishwoman, living in the same house, is so indignant that she throws a pail of dirty water over him. He forms the acquaintance of a Mrs. Wilson who employs Alice as a drawing-teacher for her daughters, and prejudices her against Alice. Shortly afterward a valuable bracelet is lost in the Wilson household and it is discovered that it was pawned with Mr. Jacobs, by a girl who said her name was Alice Mapleton. Thereupon Alice is accused by Mrs. Wilson of stealing it. Mr. Wilson, however, influenced by his daughter Louie, does not believe that Alice stole it and employs Detective Graham to investigate it. The detective proves to be a friend of Alice's lover.

CHAPTER XV.

To Meet the Storm.

HOW little did either Alice, or her mother, or father, foresee only a few short months before, such a scene as that in Mr. Jacobs' parlor! With abundant means and every want anticipated, Alice would have laughed at the idea of her being seated in the parlor of a Jewish pawnbroker, in private conversation with him and a detective. Yet the events of those few months had so changed her circumstances as to make the place a shelter, and these two men her friends and protectors. Wise are those parents, however high their position, who give their children such a training as will fit them to play their part in any sphere. The Christian principles that Alice was living by, in these days of darkness, were the same principles that would have made her life beautiful and useful in a higher station.

She sat now trying to regain her composure, while Mr. Jacobs and the detective talked the case over together and consulted as to the best means of thwarting the plot that had been laid against her. Both men had an extensive experience of the dark and crooked ways of evil men, and Alice could have found few so well able to protect her. They were both of one opinion as to the part Jackson was playing, and as to the need of teaching him such a lesson at this point as to make him afraid to carry his persecution further.

"Do you often see this man, Jackson, Miss Mapleton?" the detective asked, turning round from his conference with the pawnbroker and addressing Alice, who was gazing abstractedly on the floor and paying no attention to the talk.

"I have not seen him since he tried to force his way into our rooms some time ago, until this morning when he met me on my way to Mrs. Wilson's and again insulted me most grossly," said Alice.

"How?" asked the detective.

"By proposing that I become his wife. I have refused him, have spurned him many times, and just when I think I am free and have made my escape from him and his cowardly persecutions, then he is sure to appear, and always when I am in the deepest trouble, and he always leaves me with a more fearful threat than before."

"What was his last?" asked Mr. Graham.

"He said that I would soon find myself in deeper trouble than any I had known. Not only trouble, but disgrace; that he had power to save me, and would do so if I would become his wife. I told him that I could not conceive of a greater trouble, or suffer a deeper disgrace than to do as he wished, that I would rather have a jail for my home, and a jailer for a master, than to live in a palace with him as my husband."

"Oh! dot vas goot, dot vas goot," said Mr. Jacobs, rubbing his hands.

"And then," continued Alice, "he left me, saying: 'the next time we meet, you will be a trembling criminal, my lady, and then, perhaps, you will reach out to the only hand that can save you.' I do not know what he can do, but I know that he will stand at nothing, that will be likely to humiliate me." Alice had been trying to suppress her feelings and keep back her tears, but she could do so no longer, and burying her face in her handkerchief, she sobbed aloud.

"Now, my tear, you must not cry," and the old man laid his hand on her head. "You did vonce say you would trust old Jacobs as if he vas your fader; dot make me feel goot and proud, 'cause I know you vas goot and a lady."

"Miss Mapleton is the daughter of one of the most honorable merchants our city every had to be proud of," said the detective.

"Vell, now, you vas let de old man be your fader; you must not, vat dev say to go back on him; you still tink I vas your friend and you trust me."

"Yes indeed I do," and Alice impulsively sprang to her feet and threw her arms around the old man's neck. For a moment her golden brown hair lay against the snow-white beard of the old Jew, and with his arm around her waist, they made a pretty tableau."

"Vell, den, keep up your courage, for no harm shall come to you, if it take every tollar vat old Jacobs has cot, and don't be afraid he will hang on to his tollars, too, and dey vill find dere vas lots of fight in de old Jew yet, already."

"It was a lucky thing for you, Miss Mapleton, that your guardian angel led you to my old friend here, when you were in need of such a protector, as I know of no one more honorable and generous to those who need and deserve help, or protection, than he, and he is never mistaken in his judgment. But we must go on with our disagreeable business," said Mr. Graham.

"Let me say before we go any farther that Mr. Wilson has no part in these proceedings. He is friendly to you because his daughter, Louie, believes in you, and will not hear a word said against you without a protest."

"She is a dear, good girl," said Alice.

"Mr. Wilson asked me to quietly look into the affair, and to protect you if possible. If it had not been for this I should not have found you so soon; so you see some good has come out of the affair. Now I find that Mrs. Wilson is a very determined woman, and will go to any length rather than own herself in the wrong. She has given the case to Detective Briggs, and I feel sure that they mean to carry it to the bitter end. Briggs is a very conceited fellow; he thinks he has all the proof necessary to convict, and that he has done a very smart job. If he sees my hand in it, or if I ask him to drop the case, he will be all the more determined to carry it on."

"Vell, vat can dey do? Dey vill find dere vas some buzz-saws dev vas running against, already," laughed the old Jew.

The detective sat with his elbows on the table, and his head held between his hands, in deep thought for a few minutes; at last he raised his head.

"Do you think," he asked, addressing Alice, "that you have sufficient courage to go through a great trial and humiliation, to stand up in court charged with theft, and be stared at by an unfeeling crowd, if by so doing you could not only vindicate your own character, but restore your mother to affluence, and get rid of Mr. Jackson forever?"

"I could go through anything that a mortal could honorably suffer with their own conscience clear; but my mother, it would kill her, I fear. I have kept everything that I could from her; she does not know that I have ever been here; she is so very sensitive," said Alice.

"Sometimes such people need a shock, to shake them out of themselves as it were; it is astonishing, Miss, what some of these nervous invalids will stand, but we will hide it from her if possible. Now whatever happens do not show fear. If you do not see me, or even if you do and I act as if I had never seen you, have no doubts, but remember that I am working for you and yours, and that in a few hours you will be vindicated and all your trouble will be over. Now, Mr. Jacobs, here is the bracelet; give it to Briggs when he comes."

"Vell," said Mr. Jacobs, "I don't like to let dat fellow have de brazelet, but if you say so, all right."

"One more word, Miss Mapleton, if you are arrested, send at once for Mr. Jacobs, he will go with you, and be your bail."

"Yes, yes, my tear, send for me so ve can go in a carriage. I tinks, Mr. Graham, ve vos going to have some fun, already."

Graham shrugged his shoulders and said, "it is strange how the devil will fool his own children, encourage them to brew thunder storms to crash about their own heads, and dig pits for themselves to tumble into."

"I tink he vas only dere stepfader, 'cause dey choose him demselves, and vill not run away from him already, and some of de children is woose dan de fader. I don't tink de old poy vould be so mean to vorry a little lamb like dis one."

"By-the-by, Miss Mapleton, you will need money," said Mr. Graham, "and I will ——"

"Please do not," interrupted Alice, "I could not take any money from you, however kindly offered."

"On the word of a gentleman, it is your own," said Graham.

"Vell never mind," said Mr. Jacobs, "I vill supply Miss Alice vid vot moneys she vants, she vill take it from her fader, specially ven de fader have plenty security already. I teil you a goot joke, Miss Alice vill oxcuse me, but she vas more foolish dan dat oder girl vot only got two tollar, for she bring dis old Jew a locket and chain and I give her five or six tollar; I did not oxamine it till de oder day, and I laff so hard as vot I never laff ven I open it and find a circle of diamonds all round de picture, and it vas worth five hundred tollar, so she vill have all de moneys she vants of her own, and old Jacobs make some more interest," and he rubbed his hands in great glee over his little joke.

"Well, I will slip out of the side door," said Graham in a whisper, "there is Briggs after the bracelet, you look after Miss Mapleton, as I feel sure he will arrest her before she enters her home; I will risk it and send a carriage here."

CHAPTER XVI.

Arrested.

Alice was alone in the parlor, and she laid her arms on the table and her head on her arms and burst into tears; she had borne up wonderfully while others were with her to give encouragement, but when left to herself the reaction came in spite of all she could do; would she ever forget that day as long as she lived? what had she not suffered since the morning; charged with theft, almost driven from the house of her employer, called everything that was bad, talked to by a detective, was in danger of being arrested at any moment, and yet strange to say she cried almost (if not quite) as much for joy as grief; through the black cloud of sorrow, disgrace and danger, which surrounded her, there were rifts of light breaking through, and they were so bright that they would conquer the darkness and make all things bright again. Had she not heard from Fred, was he not coming home, had he not been true and faithful, and fighting her battles? She would be brave; she quietly left by the side door which opened on a side street; she tried to walk slowly, and with an unconcerned air, but found it almost impossible; she wanted to run, she knew there was some dreadful thing behind her. Oh, how she wanted to turn her head and look back, but had not the courage. She reached he home at last and bounded up the first fligh of stairs as if followed by some wild ani mal; how she reached the second landin she scarcely knew, for on the top step sh sank in a heap and might have rolled dow the whole flight, had she not been caugh in the strong arms of Mrs. Callaghan.

"Phat ails the darling? Och, shure it too much you're trying to do," and sh was going to carry her into her room, bu Alice, who had recovered from the faint but was unable to speak shook her hea and pointed across the hall to Mrs. Ca laghan's room.

"I understand," said the good woman "shure its your mother ye'd be thinking c first, if ye was dying; and she helped he into her own room. As soon as Alice ha swallowed a glass of water she was bette

"Now, my kind friend," were her firs words, "you must not be frightened c make a noise when I tell you somethin dreadful. They are going to arrest m Mrs. Wilson says that I have stolen bracelet, and I know that dreadful man at the bottom of the horrible affair."

Never a one shall touch ye, if I have t lick the whole force, and I'm going th very minute to tell that Mrs. Wilson, wh ever she is, that she's a liar."

"Oh, no, my dear woman," said Alic to whose face Mrs. Callaghan's last r mark had brought a smile. "You must kee cool, because I depend on you to help m in another way. You must hide it fro mother; tell her I am detained. Mr. Jacot will go with me and I shall be back in a hour, perhaps, and I shall come out a right, so you must keep cool."

Just then a step was heard on the stair Alice turned deadly pale, and Mrs. Ca laghan stood between her and the door, b in a moment Alice rallied, and passed h with all the dignity she could assume. Sh met a quiet, self-possessed man on the land ing, and with a tremor in her voice, aske whom he wished to see.

"Is your name Mapleton, Alice Mapl ton, Miss?"

"That is my name; what—what is you business, please?"

"Well," said the man, and he actuall blushed as he looked into her beautif face, and saw her great honest eyes fixe without fear upon his own, "the fact i Miss, of course there may be some mistak but I have a very unpleasant duty to pe form. I—that is—I am an officer, and mu ask you to go with me, so you'll plea come, and don't blame me."

"Certainly," said Alice, "you of cour are only doing your duty, and it would b very silly of me to blame you for the wror that others may be doing."

"Shure, it's not afraid to go anywhe that she is, for she's as innocent as a new born babe of doing anybody a wrong, b if it's the guilty and the mean ye'd be a ter, ye'd better be taking up them as sh ye," said Mrs. Callaghan, as she followe Alice and the officer down stairs.

"Oh, Mrs. Callaghan, will you plea go to Mr. Jacobs and tell him that I cann call, and—" she said no more, for the stood Mr. Jacobs himself.

"Vell, Miss Mapleton, it vas astonis ment to you dat I vas here, but I tink pe haps my friend, Briggs, vas going to a you to take a valk, and as I vas going d vay myself, I vill take you in my carriage

"God bless you for that, sur, for th young creature is tired out now, for it's h own carriage and footman that she's be after calling all her loife-time, when s wanted to go out, till now." The last pa of Mrs. Callaghan's remark was intend for the detective.

"You are very kind," was all Alice sai

"I will see to everything," said the go Irish woman, but when she saw Alice a the detective seated in the carriage the tea were streaming down her face.

We will not follow them to the statio suffice it to say that the charge was mad and Mr. Jacobs as bail was accepted, a in less than two hours Alice was at hor again with her mother, who had no know edge of the terrible trials that Alice h gone through that day. Alice had not f so happy for two years, and her moth was delighted to hear her singing some her old songs. But a chill would creep ov her when she thought of what she had y to go through, for the trial was to take pla the next day at ten, but the fear would n last more than a moment, when the bi singing in her heart, "he is coming home "he is coming home," would drive it awa

I AM coming, O my Saviour,
For my heart is sad and sore,
And I ask the rest thou givest
To be mine for evermore.
Earth's hopes like flowers have faded,
Earth's friends have passed away;
I am weary, heavy laden,

I am coming, Saviour, coming,

And I know thou wilt receive me,
For thy promise is my plea.

I have heard thy loving call;
And though sins untold oppress me,
Thou can'st save me from them all.
am coming, O my Saviour,
Guide my wandering steps aright,

I am coming, etc.

I shall never perish there!

Thou wilt surely make me whole.

ELI BROWN.

FREE.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh for yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

SELF-HELP IN A MISSIONARY WORK.

The President of Anatolia College, Marsovan Asiatic Turkey, writes, us the following interesting letter: "I desire to express grateful appreciation of a gift of $20 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in aid of our Self-Help Department in connection with Anatolia College. The field under the superintendence of this station is 35,000 square miles in extent. The evangelical work is established at about twenty points, from each of which the influence radiates. The centre of all is this city, Marsovan, where our educational institutions are situated. Christian education holds a prominent place in our work. The school goes with the Gospel, wherever the Gospel is to stay. Anatolia is one of the younger colleges, but very vigorous, with a hundred young men in attendance. Connected with it is the Self-Help Department, consisting of shops in which energetic young men of scanty means may labor from one to four hours a day, and thus meet, in considerable part, the expense of education. Instead of giving much direct assistance, we show these young people a way to help themselves.

"Our chief industry is cabinet-making. Our chairs, tables, desks and other furniture are bought by the officials and the better class of people in the region, and the market for them is opening more and more. The object is not to make money, but to make men. Nevertheless, whatever can be recovered by sales is so much economized, and is, by so much, better than money given in direct aid of poor students. In 1892 we secured from sales 30 per cent. of the expense of the establishment; in 1893, 52 per cent., and in 1894, 64 per cent. We have much hope of getting back over 70 per cent. this year, and of doing better still, as our market opens, and civilization advances. If any one is curious enough to figure out the avails of this $20, on the supposition that seventy per cent. is recovered, and used again, the same proportion of the remainder, in each successive case following the same rule, he will find that before this $20 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is finally exhausted, it will be equal to a contribution of over $52. That is, assistance given through the Self-Help Department, accomplishes more than two and a half times as much as when given in direct aid, and used but once.

"Let me mention that, on these same mission premises, within sixteen rods of the college, there is a very prosperous Girls' Seminary, its counterpart, wherein more than a hundred of the future wives and mothers of leading households are in course of training. The brightest young people of the land are under our tuition, and the influence of these schools is controlling, in a region of country larger than all New England."

THE LAST ENEMY OVERCOME.

The late Dean Stanley said that the great Dr. Arnold of Rugby, was exceedingly fond of the Te Deum. He would sit entranced as the mighty strains of organ and voices rolled up to the groined roof. But his face glowed and beamed with rapture at his favorite verse, "When thou hadst overcome the sharpness of death, thou didst open the kingdom of heaven to all believers."

W A FAITHFUL MISSIONARY DIED.

n March, 1872, Rev. J. D. Gordon, a Christian missionary in New Hebrides was acked by a superstitious native who regded him as bringing disease among tm, although they were indebted to a trling vessel for that. A boat brought o the shocking news (from Erromanga), wh a very pathetic letter from the nati Christians there. Atash, Mackie, Nale and some other poor fellows came in th boat, broken-hearted, (writes a brother missionary.) What a difference it mes to hear of such an event from a safe diance in civilization and to have the tr edy enacted close to your home and by thvery people or their kindred with whom ye are every day surrounded. It begets stn an eerie feeling; and for the time it bl a distrust of black faces in general. Whave since heard that the dear Missi Gdon was just translating the Acts of thApostles at the stoning of Stephen, and th when his murderers smilingly called hi out and sent him to join the noble arv of the martyrs, the ink was still wet on ne page at these heart-breakingly tender words, "Lord, lay not this sin to their chge."

PITCAIRN'S WONDROUS STORY.

A descendant of the "Bounty" Mutineers tells of God's Work of Grace, in Redeeming the Lonely Island—John Adams' Conversion the Real Turning-Point—A Centre of Evangelism.

ALTHOUGH the story of Pitcairn Island and the famous "Mutiny of the Bounty," has already been told so often and in so many tongues that it has passed into history, the th of thrilling incident and wonderful eerience comes to us anew from the pen descendant of one of the original actors the drama of real life. Rosalind Amelia ing, a native of Pitcairn Island, has tten a small volume on the subject, which just been issued by the Pacific Press lishing Company of Oakland, Cal., as she has had access to many original uments and has gathered the remarkable y from the lips of those who had it from actual participators, her narrative comes us with a freshness and vividness of ring such as no other description of se events has ever possessed. Her fa- (who died in 1893), was the grandson olohn Adams, one of the mutineers e "Bounty."

itcairn Island is a mere dot on the om of the Pacific Ocean, two a-quarter miles long by one a-half wide. Lying two deges south of the tropic of Capborn, it is in an almost perclimate. Beautiful tropical s, graceful cocoa-nut palms banyans cover its surface m end to end. It is a miniae Eden. Its people — about o hundred and thirty in numb — are half-castes, their dark tures and black hair betraying r Tahitian blood, although she have light complexions and e eyes. To strangers they are eedingly kind and hospitable.

On Dec. 29, 1787, the sloop-of- "Bounty," sailed from Engd, to proceed to the Society nds, where she was to procure nts of the breadfruit tree and ey them to the West Indies f transplanting. She was comnded by Lieutenant Bligh, h a crew of forty-five men inding a gardener, and was provioned for eighteen months. Arng at Tahiti in the following ctober, she spent six months colling plants, and thence sailed f Anamooka, on leaving which ns of mutiny appeared among e crew. On April 28, 1789, the utbreak occurred; the crew ted Captain Bligh, bound him d placed him with eighteen othe in a boat which was sent adrift d soon landed on the island of Toa. Bligh and those of his comes who escaped the arrows of tile natives eventually reached gland in safety, after many perils adventures. Soon another vernment vessel, the "Pandor" was sent out to capture the utineers. They found only fourn, eight having gone off with e sloop "Bounty" and two having been ked by the Tahitians. The captured mutneers were taken back to England, where, er due trial, three paid the extreme penalty, and the others were released after long imprisonment. Meanwhile the "Bounty," with Fletcher Christian in command, after long cruising, reached the lonely Pitcairn Island, and the mutineers, finding it uninhabited, decided to settle there. These fugitives burned the sloop and spent the early days of their settlement in caves and under canvas tents, while cottages were being built. On that lonely isle, far from the haunts of men, they hoped to hide themselves from the offended law. They had taken with them from Tahiti six native men, ten women and a girl of fifteen. But no degree of outward security could bring peace to minds constantly disturbed with self-accusing thoughts, and the reproaches of conscience. Quarrels broke out among them and the Tahitians shot and killed five of the whites. Soon only four of the original mutineers were left alive, and the survivors, by plotting with the native women, succeeded in killing the Tahiti men. Within a short period, two others of the little group of white men died violent deaths, and John Adams and Edward Young alone were left of the "Bounty's" crew in charge of the rapidly growing colony. They bitterly repented their misdeeds and strove to train the young children in the paths of virtue and truth, imploring pardon for their own sins and aid in the work that lay before them. Young died within a year and John Adams was left the sole survivor of the mutiny, with twenty-three children and their mothers under his care.

THE CHAPEL AT PITCAIRN ISLAND

THE MISSION-HOUSE

THE LANDING-PLACE, "BOUNTY BAY"—PORTRAIT OF ROSA YOUNG.

A Bible and a prayer book which had been saved from the "Bounty," became very dear to Adams. He found peace in Christ and resolved to devote his remaining years to teaching and helping the others. All regarded him lovingly as the father of the island. In 1808, the American ship "Topaz," in passing, discovered that the island was inhabited and the whole of the startling story was soon disclosed to the world. A few years later, two British warships visited the island and their captains were astonished to find the colony living harmoniously under Adam's patriarchal rule, and the land laid out in regular plantations. The children had grown up to be young men and women and were trained in Christian principles. In the little island paradise, the dark crimes of the past had been deeply atoned for, and now amid the groves of orange and palm, the vineyards and the gardens, the sons and daughters of the dead mutineers lived happy, simple lives, trusting in God for all things and lovingly helping each other. Ship after ship called at the island and each vessel left some useful gift for the exiles. John Buffett and John Evans, two Englishmen, came to teach the young islanders cabinet-making and other useful arts. The children of the original settlers intermarried, and in 1825 the colony numbered sixty-one persons. All who visited the place were charmed with the open, simple manners of the islanders, their devotion to religious duties, their reverence at meals, and the modesty of the women. The day was invariably begun and ended with prayer and praise to the Divine Father for his mercies and preserving care—a custom that is still religiously observed by their descendants. Sunday was a day of complete cessation from work; no cooking was done, no fires were made, and nothing of a worldly nature was permitted to interfere with the day of rest.

John Adams died in 1829, the last of the mutineers. The colony continued to grow until the island became too small for its support, and in 1831 the entire colony, with its goods, was transported to Tahiti on British ships. But fever and death thinned the ranks, and soon the colonists returned to Pitcairn. After many seasons of internal turmoil, during which ambitious adventurers well-nigh ruined the colony, harmony was restored, laws were adopted for the government of the island, and a magistrate chosen. In 1856, the colony was once more removed, this time to Norfolk Island, which CONSCIENCE.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., preached last Sunday on the Text: Matt. 27: 24, "He took water and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it."

About seven o'clock in the morning, up the marble stairs of a palace and across the floors of richest mosaic, and under ceilings dyed with all the splendors of color, and between snowbanks of white and glistening sculpture, passes a poor, pale, sick young man of thirty-three, already condemned to death, on his way to be condemned again. Jesus of Nazareth is his name.

Coming out to meet him on this tessellated pavement is an unscrupulous, compromising, time-serving cowardly man, with a few traces of sympathy and fair dealing left in his composition—Governor Pontius Pilate. Did ever such opposites meet? Luxury and pain, selfishness and generosity, arrogance and humility, sin and holiness, midnight and midnoon.

The bloated-lipped governor takes the cushioned seat, but the prisoner stands, his wrists manacled. In a semi-circle around the prisoner are the Sanhedrists, with flashing eyes and brandished fists, prosecuting this case in the name of religion, for the bitterest persecutions have been religious prosecutions; and when Satan takes hold of a good man he makes up by intensity for brevity of occupation. If you have never seen an ecclesiastical court trying a man, then you have no idea of the foaming infernalism of these old religious Sanhedrists. Governor Pilate cross-questions the prisoner, and finds right away he is innocent, and wants to let him go. His caution is also increased by some one who comes to the Governor and whispers in his ear. The Governor puts his hand behind his ear, so as to catch the words almost inaudible. It is a message from Claudia Procula, his wife, who has had a dream about the innocence of this prisoner and about the danger of executing him, and she awakens from this morning dream in time to send the message to her husband, then on the judicial bench. And what with the protest of his wife, and the voice of his own conscience, and the entire failure of the Sanhedrists to make out their case, Governor Pilate resolves to discharge the prisoner from custody.

But the intimation of such a thing brings upon the Governor an equinoctial storm of indignation. They will report him to the Emperor at Rome. They will have him recalled. They will send him up home, and he will be hung for treason, for the Emperor at Rome has already a suspicion in regard to Pilate, and that suspicion does not cease until Pilate is banished and commits suicide. So Governor Pontius Pilate compromises the matter, and proposes that Christ be whipped instead of assassinated. So the prisoner is fastened to a low pillar, and on his bent and bared back come the thongs of leather, with pieces of lead and bone intertwisted, so that every stroke shall be [illegible]. Christ lifts himself from the scourging, with flushed cheek and torn and quivering and mangled flesh, presenting a spectacle of suffering in which Rubens, the painter, found the theme for his greatest masterpiece.

But the Sanhedrists are not yet satisfied, They have had some of his nerves lacerated; they want them all lacerated. They have had some of his blood; they want all of it, down to the last corpuscle. So Governor Pontius Pilate, after all this merciful hesitation, surrenders to the demoniacal cry of "Crucify him!" But the Governor sends for something. He sends a slave out to get something. Although the constables are in haste to take the prisoner to execution and the mob outside are impatient to glare upon their victim, a pause is necessitated. Yonder it comes, a wash basin. Some pure, bright water is poured into it, and then Governor Pilate puts his white, delicate hands into the water and rubs them together, and then lifts them dripping, for the towel fastened at the slave's girdle, while he practically says: "I wash my hands of this whole homicidal transaction, I wash my hands of this entire responsibility; you will have to bear it." That is the meaning of my text when it says. "He took water and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person; see ye to it."

Behold, in this, that ceremony amounts to nothing, if there are not in it correspondencies of heart and life. It is a good thing to wash the hands. God created three quarters of the world water, and in that commanded cleanliness; and when the ancients did not take the hint he plunged the whole world under water and kept it there for some time. Hand washing was a religious ceremony among the Jews. The Jewish Mishna gave particular direction how that the hands must be thrust three times up to the wrists in water, and the palm of the hand must be rubbed with the closed fist of the other. All that well enough for a symbol, but here in the text is a man who proposes to wash away the guilt of a sin which he does not quit and of which he does not make any repentance. Pilate's wash basin was a dead failure.

Ceremonies, however beautiful and appropriate, may be no more than this hypocritical ablution. In infancy we may be sprinkled from the baptismal font, and in manhood we may wade into deep immersions, and yet never come to moral purification. We may kneel without prayer, and bow without reverence, and sing without any acceptance. All your creeds, and liturgies, and sacraments, and genuflections, and religious convocations amount to nothing unless your heart-life go into them. When that bronzed slave took from the presence of Pilate that wash basin he carried away none of Pilate's cruelty, or Pilate's wickedness, or Pilate's guilt.

Nothing against creeds; we all have them, either written or implied. Nothing against ceremonies; they are of infinite importance. Nothing against sacraments; they are divinely commanded. Nothing against a rosary, if there be as many heartfelt prayers as beads counted. Nothing against incense floating up from censer amid Gothic arches, if the prayers be as genuine as the aroma is sweet. Nothing against Epiphany, or Lent, or Ash Wednesday, or Easter, or Good Friday, or Whitsuntide, or Palm Sunday, if these symbols have behind them genuine repentance, and holy reminiscence, and Christian consecration. But ceremony is only the sheath to the sword, it is only the shell to the kernel, it is only the lamp to the flame, it is only the body to the spirit. The outward must be symbolical of the inward. Wash the hands by all means, but, more than all, wash the heart.

Behold, also, as you see Governor Pontius Pilate thrust his hand into this wash-basin, the power of conscience. He had an idea there was blood on his hand—the blood of an innocent person, whom he might have acquitted if he only had the courage. Poor Pilate! his conscience was after him, and he knew the stain would never be washed from the right hand or the left hand, and until the day of his death, though he might wash in all the lavers of the Roman Empire, there would be still eight fingers and two thumbs red at the tips.

Oh, the power of conscience when it is fully aroused? With whip of scorpions over a bed of spikes in pitch of midnight it chases guilt. Are there ghosts? Yes, not of the graveyard, but of one's mind not at rest.

> And thus, Brutus, amid his slumbering host,
> Startled with Cæsar's stalwart ghost.

Macbeth looked at his hand after the midnight assassination, and he says:

> Will all great Neptune's ocean wash this blood
> Clean from my hand? No; this my hand will rather
> The multitudinous seas incarnadine,
> Making the green one red.

For every sin, great or small, conscience, which is the voice of God, has a reproof, more or less emphatic. Charles IX., responsible for St. Bartholomew massacre, was chased by the bitter memories, and in his dying moment said to his doctor, Ambrose Parry: "Doctor, I don't know what's the matter with me; I am in a fever of body and mind, and have been for a long while. Oh, if I had only spared the innocent, and the imbecile, and the cripple!" Rousseau declared in old age that a sin he committed in his youth still gave him sleepless nights. Charles II., of Spain, could not sleep unless he had in the room a confessor and two friars. Cataline had such bitter memories he was startled at the least sound. Cardinal Beaufort, having slain the Duke of Gloucester, often in the night would say, "Away! away! why do you look at me?" Richard III., having slain his two nephews, would sometimes in the night shout from his couch and clutch his sword, fighting apparitions. Dr. Webster, having slain Parkman in Boston, and while waiting for his doom, complained to the jailer that the prisoners on the other side of the wall all night long kept charging him with his crime, when there were no prisoners on the other side of the wall. It was the voice of his own conscience.

From what did Adam and Eve try to hide when they had all the world to themselves? From their own conscience. What made Cain's punishment greater than he could bear? His conscience. What made Ahab cry out to the prophet, "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" What made the great Felix tremble before the little missionary? Conscience. What made Belshazzar's teeth chatter with a chill when he saw a finger come out of the black sleeve of the midnight and write on the plastering? Conscience, conscience?

Why is it that that man in this audience, with all the marks of worldly prosperity upon him, is agitated while I speak, and is now flushed and is now pale, and then the breath is uneven, and then beads of perspiration on the forehead, and then the look of unrest comes to a look of horror and despair? I know not. But he knows, and God knows. It may be that he despoiled a fair young life and turned innocence into a waif, and the smile of hope into the brazen laughter of despair. Or it may be that he has in his possession the property of others, and by some stratagem he keeps it according to law, and yet he knows it is not his own, and that if his heart should stop beating this moment he would be in hell forever. Or it may be he is responsible for a great mystery, the disappearance of some one who was never heard of, and the detectives were baffled, and the tracks were all covered up, and the swift horse or the night train took him out of reach, and there were only two persons in the universe who knew of it—God and himself. God present at the time of the tragedy and present at the retrospection, and conscience—conscience that stings, conscience with pincers, conscience with flails, conscience with furnaces, is on him; and until a man's conscience rouses him he does not repent. What if that farmer converted to God go to his neighbor and say: "Neighbor, I have four of your sheep. They came over into my fold six years ago. They had your mark upon them, and I changed it to my mark. I want you to have those sheep, and I want you to have the interest on the money, and I want you to have the increase of the fold; if you want to send me to prison, I shall make no complaint." The infidel heard of the man's conversion, and he said: "Now, now, if you have got them sheep you are welcome to them. I don't want nothing of those things at all. You just go away from me. Something has got hold of you that I don't understand. I heard you were down at the religious meetings." But the converted man would not allow things to stand that way, and so the infidel said: "Well, now, you can pay me the value of the sheep, and six per cent. interest from the time to this, and I shan't say anything more about it. Just go away from me." What was the matter with the two farmers? In the one case a convicted conscience leading him to honesty, and in the other case a convicted conscience warning against infidelity.

Thomas Oliver was one of John Wesley's preachers. The early part of his life had been full of recklessness, and he had made debts wherever he could borrow. He was converted to God, and then he went forth to preach and pay his debts. He had a small amount of property left him, and immediately set out to pay his debts, and everybody knew he was in earnest; and to consummate the last payment he had to sell his horse and saddle and bridle. That is conscience. That is converted conscience. That is religion. Frank Tiebout, a converted rumseller, had a large amount of liquor on hand at the time of his conversion, and he put all the kegs, and barrels, and demijohns in a wagon and took them down in front of the old church where he had been converted, and had everything emptied into the street. That is religion. Why are thousands of dollars sent every year to the United States Treasury at Washington as "conscience money?" Why, it simply means there are postmasters, and there are attorneys, and there are officials who sometimes retain that which does not belong to them; and these men are converted, or under powerful pressure of conscience, they make restitution. If all the moneys out of which the State and the United States treasuries have been defrauded should come back to their rightful exchequers, there would be money enough to pay all the State debts and all the United States debt by day after to-morrow.

Conversion amounts to nothing unless the heart is converted, and the pocket-book is converted, and the cash-drawer is converted, and the ledger is converted, and the fire-proof safe is converted, and the pigeon-hole containing the correspondence is converted, and his improvement is noticed even by the canary bird that sings in the parlor and the cat that licks the platter after the meal, and the dog that comes bounding from the kennel to greet him. A man half converted, or quarter converted, or a thousandth part converted, is not converted at all. What will be the great book in the Day of Judgment? Conscience. Conscience recalling misimproved opport[illegible] ties Conscience recalling unforgiven sins. Conscience bringing up all the past. Alas! for his Governor, Pontius Pilate. That night after the court had adjourned and the Sanhedrists had gone home, and nothing was heard outside the room but the step of the sentinel, I see Pontius Pilate arise from his tapestried and sleepless couch, and go to the laver and begin to wash his hands, crying, "Out, out, crimson spot! Tellest thou to me, and to God, and to the night, my crime? Is there no alkali to remove the dreadful stains? Is there no chemistry to dissolve this carnage? Must I to the day of my death carry the blood of this innocent man on my heart and hand? Out, thou crimson spot!" The worst thing a man can have is an evil conscience, and the worst thing a man can have is what Paul call a good conscience.
